PREFACE.

NO subject can be more interesting to man, than the history of man; and no method can be more proper for investigating this subject, than examining the different appearances which he assumes in different quarters of the globe. History does not offer an example of fuch difinterested efforts, towards the enlargement of human knowledge, as have been made by the British nation, since the accession of his prefent Majesty to the throne—the noble and hazardous enterprizes undertaken and executed under his auspices, will remain to fucceeding ages, a monument

of the zeal and patronage of GEORGE THE THIRD.

If to bring to view a part of our Brethren of Mankind hitherto unknowna race of men that do honour to the name of Manhood, be a subject generally interesting, the following pages must ensure a favourable reception. The Public have been often amused with uninteresting histories of voyages and shipwrecks; and siction and fancy have been tortured to throw into the dish something palateable; it may therefore be necessary to mention a few facts as to the authenticity of a narrative, which arrests the attention with incidents, feldom furpased in the airy visions of romance.

The

The Antelope was not fitted out for the purpose of adventure or discovery; it was a pacquet commanded by Captain Henry Wilson, and manned by a number of hands the greater part of whom are now in Britain, and can vouch for the reality of every circumstance. They were wrecked on this almost unknown coast, and after suffering a series of unparallelled hardships, were restored to their country, their home and their friends, by the benevolence of this new race of men.

It is somewhat remarkable that although the islands which gave birth to some of the most important scenes in this work, lie at no very great distance from the common track to China, yet it does not appear that any Europeans ever landed on them. They were not however totally unknown. In the Lettres edifientes et curieuses, we find an account of this Archipelago, of which the Palos or Pelew Islands constitute the fifth division; the other four confisting of the Islands which are now known by the name of the New Carolines. Le Pere Cantora tells us, that being shipwrecked on one of the Caroline Islands, he had used every method to get information concerning the rest; and that he was informed, "that the people of the Pelew Islands were inhuman and favage; that both men and women were entirely naked, and fed upon human flesh; that the inhabitants of the Carolines Carolines looked on them with horror as the enemies of mankind, and with whom they held it dangerous to have any intercourse." From this and any other information that can be procured, it appears that for a long series of years, the inhabitants of the Pelew Islands, have been separated from the rest of mankind, even those most contiguous to themselves. Their ignorance of the existence of white people, abundantly evinces their being total strangers to Europe at any rate.

The name given by the Spaniards to these Islands is the Palos Islands; which indeed is the name by which all the Caroline Islands formerly went; probably owing to the number of tall palm trees with which they are covered, having the appearance of masts of ships at a distance, the Spanish word palos signifies a mast.

If therefore this publication tends to introduce a new people to the reader, who have, uninformed and untaught as they are, brought their manners to a great degree of civilization; the politician, the moralist, and the friend of humanity, will not consider this an useless work, more especially to those who have not access to peruse Mr Keate's very complete publication on the subject.

Wilson, (fince dead) Dedrick Windler, Zachariah Allen, John Cooper, James Bluitt, Thomas Castles, William Roberts, Nicholas Tyacke, William Stewart, Madan Blanchard, Thomas Whitsield, William Cobbledick, and James Duncan, Seamen. Besides these Captain Wilson was allowed sixteen Chinese, to keep the ship's complement of hands complete.

On Monday the 21st they got clear to fea, having discharged the Pilot, and taken leave of several gentlemen who accompanied them a few leagues. From the 23d July, to the 8th of August, they had very stormy unsettled weather, insomuch that their foretopmast sprung, and all their live cattle died. On the 9th the weather became more moderate; fo that opening their ports they dried the ship, examined their stores and provisions, and proceeded cheerfully on their voyage, flattering themselves their distress and danger were now fairly past; little judging, that the hard misfortunes they were about to undergo, were fo quickly to overtake them.

Early on Sunday morning, the 10th of October, a strong breeze sprung up, attended with much rain, thunder and lightning. Captain Wilson had gone to bed about twelve, and Mr Benger the chief mate, commanded on deck. While the feamen were busied in reefing the fails, the man on watch exclaimed, Breakers, which he had scarce pronounced when the ship struck. It is not easy to express the consternation which enfued; all who were in bed below, were immediately on deck, enquiring the occasion of the noise and confusion: too soon they learned their difmal fituation; in less than an hour she bulged, and filled with water up to the lower deck hatchways. During this scene of horror and dismay, the seamen eagerly besought the Captain to direct them, and his orders would be implicitly obeyed.

Captain Wilson's first orders were, to fecure the gun-powder and small arms, and to get on deck the bread, and fuch other provisions as were liable to be spoiled by the water, and cover them with tarpaulins, &c. to keep them from the rain. As the ship took a heel in filling, there was some reasons to fear she might overset; to prevent which, they cut away the mizen-mast, the main and fore top-masts, and lowered the fore and main-yards, to ease her. The boats were then hoisted out, and filled with provisions; a compass, and some small arms, with ammunition, and two men, being put into each with directions to keep them under the lee: of the ship, and to be ready to receive: their ship-mates, in case the vessel should part by the violence of the wind and

waves, as it then blew an exceeding strong gale.

Every thing being now done that prudence could dictate in fo trying and distressful a situation, the officers and people assembled on the quarter deck, that part being highest out of the water, and best sheltered from the rain and fea by the quarter-boards; and waited for day-light, in hopes of feeing land, for as yet they had not been able to difcern any. During this dreadful interval, the anxiety and horror of which is much easier to be imagined than described, Captain Wilson endeavoured to revive the drooping spirits of his crew, by reminding them, that shipwreck was a misfortune to which navigators were always liable; and that although theirs was rendered more difficult and diftreffing by its happening in an unknown and unfrequented sea, yet yet he wished to remind them that this confideration should only rouse them to greater activity, in endeavouring to extricate themselves: and, above all, he begged leave to impress on their minds this circumstance, that whenever misfortunes, fuch as theirs, had happened, they had generally been rendered much more dreadful than they would otherwise have been, by the despair of the crew, and by their disagreement among themselves. To prevent which, he most earnestly requested each of them, separately, not to taste any spirituous liquor, on any account whatever; and he had the fatisfaction to find a ready consent given to this most important advice.

We have been the more circumstantial in our account of this part of their transactions, because we think it displays, in a most remarkable manner, the the presence of mind which was preferved, and the prudence that was exerted by Captain Wilson in one of the most trying situations to which human nature can be exposed. It shews also, in the most inequivocal manner, the temper and disposition of his officers, and the whole crew, and pronounces their eulogium with ten thousand times the force of any words that could be used.

As they were almost worn out by the excessive labour they had undergone, two glasses of wine and some biscuit were given to every man aboard, and they waited for day-break with no little impatience, in hope of discovering land. Meantime they endeavoured to support each others spirits as much as possible, and by the Captain's direction, put on as many clothes as possible to carry with them, in the event of getting safe:

fafe from the wreck; and let it not be forgotten, among many other remarkable instances that occurred, in the course of this voyage, to the honour of this crew, that the utmost cordiality prevailed among them; none attempted in the hour of confusion, to touch his neighbour's property, nor to taste the forbidden spirits.

The dawn discovered to their view a small island, at the distance of about three or four leagues to the southward; and as the day-light increased, they saw more islands to the eastward. They now began to feel apprehensions on account of the natives, to whose dispositions they were perfect strangers: however, after manning the boats, and loading them in the best manner they were able for the general good, they were dispatched to the small island, under the direction of Mr Benger, the chief mate, who was earnestly requested to establish, if possible, a friendly intercourse with the natives, if they found any, and carefully to avoid all disagreement with them, unless reducd to it by the most urgent necessity. As foon as the boats were gone, those who were left in the ship began to get the booms over board, and to make a raft for their fecurity, if the ship should go to pieces, which was hourly expected: at the same time they were under the most painful apprehensions for the safety of the boats, on which all depended; not only on account of the natives, but with regard to the weather also, as it continued to blow very hard. But in the afternoon they were relieved from their fears on this head, by the return of the boats, with the welcome news of their having landed the stores in fafety, and left five men to take care of

of them; and that there was no appearance of inhabitants being on the island where they landed: that they had found a secure harbour, well sheltered from the weather, and also some fresh water. This good account revived them, and they proceeded in completing their raft with fresh vigour, having got another glass of wine with biscuit. A very distressing accident however, happened this day; the mizen-mast being. found near the ship's stern, and part of the rigging entangled with the mizen chains, Godfrey Minks was employed to clear it, and whilst he was doing it, unluckily flipped overboard: the boats were immediately sent to his assistance, but without effect.

Having finished the raft, they loaded it together with the jolly boat and pinnace, with as many stores and provisions as they could bear, consistently with with the safety of the people who were to be in them. And as the day was advancing, the Captain furmoned all the people aboard; indeed, so busily were they employed in bringing as much as possible with them, it cost some pains to get them all collected. Their feelings on quitting the Antelope, going they knew not whither, were of the most distressing nature. The stoutest of the hands were put aboard the pinnace, which took the raft in tow and moved flowly on, till they had cleared the reef; while the jolly boat, which was of little service to the raft, proceeded alone to the shore, and joined their companions that had been left in the morning. They found a tent ready for their reception, and a spot of ground cleared for the stores &c.

The situation of those aboard the pinnace and the rast, till they cleared the the reef, was terrible indeed. The great swelling of the sea was such, that they repeatedly lost sight of each other, and those on the raft were obliged to tie themselves to the planks with ropes to prevent their being washed off; whilst the horror of the scene was increased by the screams of the Chinese, who were not accustomed to the perils of the deep.

When they had fairly cleared the reef, they got into deep smooth water, in the channel running between the reef and the islands; but on approaching the land, they found a very strong current which drove them considerably to leeward. They soon found they could not resist its impetuosity, and therefore having brought the rast to a grapnel, all the hands got aboard the pinnace, to relieve the rowers. Mean while, the cargo of the jolly boat being B unladen, unladen, Captain Wilson, was returning in her, to affift those aboard the pinnace. The night was by this time dark, and the Captain overhearing them at a distance, hailed them. Those aboard the pinnace, overjoyed at the near prospect of relief, returned the haloo, in a manner fo unufual, that Captain Wilson immediately concluded they were natives. He was the readier to form this idea, as he had just learned from those on shore, that from various circumstances they had reason to conclude, there had been natives on that fpot very lately; he therefore retreated to shore with the utmost precipitation. Happily, however, they were foon relieved by the arrival of the pinnace, when all the company shook hands together, (need it be added,) with great cordiality. They supped on cheese, bifcuit and water, and having lighted a match kindled a fire in the cove, by which they dried their clothes and warmed themselves. The night proved very uncomfortable as the weather was exceedingly tempestuous, while the fear of the ship going to pieces, before they could save such things as they needed, not a little heightened their distress. Lest they should be surprised by the natives, they set a watch and slept on the ground by turns.

Next forenoon, (Monday the 11th) proved very stormy, they attempted to bring off the raft in vain, and were obliged to leave it, bringing with them the sails and remainder of the provisions.

In the afternoon, the weather was more moderate and the boats were difpatched to the ship to bring off what they could; while those on shore were employed in brushing up the small arms.

The evening fet in very squally, and as the boats did not return from the ship till about ten o'clock, those on shore were not a little alarmed about them; nor were they much easier, when on their return they learned, that the vessel was in fuch a situation, as made it exceedingly probable she could not hold together till morning.-When we consider their situation on this information, it must be granted, that the vicissitudes of human life, have seldom produced a coincidence of circumstances more peculiarly distressing. The only hope they had, of yet floating and repairing the vessel, so as to return to China, now to all appearance, impracticable-ignorant where they were, or among whom-feparated not only from wives, children and home, but from all all mankind, except perhaps a race of favages, as they naturally supposed—without any prospect of relief—and at the same time shivering under a storm still more tempestuous than the former night, altogether brings to view a situation, which none can think of, even at this distance of time, without commiserating.

In the morning it blew exceedingly strong, so that the boats could not go off to the wreck: the men therefore employed themselves in drying their provisions, and forming better tents, from the materials which they had brought from the ship the day before. About eight o'clock in the morning, the people being employed as above, and in clearing the ground from the wood which was behind the tents, Captain Wilson with Tom Rose, a Marlay, whom they had taken on board at

Macao

Macao, being on the beach, collecting the fresh water which dropped from the rocks, faw two canoes, with men in them, coming round the point into the bay. This gave fuch alarm, that the people all ran to their arms; however, as there were but few of the natives, Captain Wilson desired them to keep out of fight, until they should perceive what reception he met with, but to be prepared for the worst. They foon perceived that the natives had feen the Captain and Tom Rose, for they conversed together, and kept their eyes stedfastly fixed on that part of the shore where the English were. The natives advanced very cautiously toward them, and when they came near enough to be heard, the Captain directed Rose to speak to them in his own language; which they at first did not seem to understand; but they stopped their canoes, and foon after one of them afked, in the Malay tongue, who our people were, and whether they were friends or enemies? Rose was directed to reply, that they were Englishmen, who had lost their ship on the reef, but had faved their lives, and were friends. On this they seemed to confer together for a short time, and then stepped out of the canoes into the water, and went toward the shore. Captain Wilson instantly waded into the water to meet them, and embracing them in the most friendly manner, led them to the shore, and presented them to his officers, and unfortunate companions. They were eight in number, two of whom, it was afterwards known, were brothers to the Rupack, or King, of the neighbouring islands, and one was a Malay, who had been shipwrecked in a vessel belonging to a Chinese, resident on the island of · ^ 1 Ternate, Ternate, one of the same group of islands; he had been kindly treated by the King, who, he said, was a good man; and that his people also were courteous. He told them farther, that a canoe having been out sishing, had seen the ship's mast; and that the King, being informed of it, sent off these two canoes at four o'clock that morning, to see what was become of the people who had belonged to her; and they knowing of the harbour which the Englishmen were in, had come directly thither.

Being about breakfast hour, Captain Wilson, Tom Rose and only a sew others breakfasted with them; and in the course of their short conversation, a wish was hinted to be informed, by what means the Malay they had brought with them, had reached their islands. The Malay, who could indistinctly hammer out a few sentences both of Dutch:

Dutch and English, informed them, that he had formerly commanded a Chinese trading vessel, and about ten months fince, on a voyage to Amboyna, had been cast away on a neighbouring island, from whence he had come to Pelew; this account they afterwards found reason to believe was not just. The Malay also mentioned, that one of the Pelew fishing canoes, had observed the wreck, and in consequence, these two canoes had been difpatched to fuccour the mariners if found. They disliked tea, but relished the biscuits very much; and in ashort time- grew very familiar and happy with us. After breakfast Captain Wilfon introduced them to feveral of his officers, and acquainted them with our mode of welcoming, by shaking hands, a custom which they never afterwards omitted on meeting any of the English. 1:11 -... 13; The

The natives were of a moderate fize, but admirably proportioned and very muscular; their hair was long and black, rolled up in a peculiarly neat manner close to their heads; except the younger of the King's two fons, none of them had beards; they in general plucked out the hairs by the roots; and it was remarkable, that when they afterwards examined the persons of the Englishmen, they discovered not a little surprise that they could fuffer hair to grow on their breasts. They were perfectly. naked, and their skin of a deep copper colour; only their thighs appeared much darker, from being tatooed very closely. They used cocoa-oil, rubbing it on their skins, which gave them a shining appearance and very soft. The chief carried in his hand, a basket of beetle-nut, and a very neat bamboo, which contained what they called their chinam; chinam; this is coral burnt to a lime, with which they sprinkle the leaf of the beetle-nut and then chew it; this makes their faliva red, which appearing betwixt their jet black teeth, occasions a very disagreeable contrast. They were conducted round the cove, and to the great surprise of the English, walked on broken rock, shells and thorny plants with the greatest ease. They were now enabled to support a mutual conversation, by means of the Malay-man, on the part of the natives, and Tom Rose on that of the English, and thus had an opportunity of examining one another as to the different appearances which occasioned mutual furprise. From this first interval, as well as what happened afterwards, it was evident, the natives had never before feen a white man, and were ignorant of the existence of any

any fuch; the natural furprife at feeing them may therefore be conceived. The appearance of cloaths was quite new; indeed, they were at first at a loss to determine, whether the man and his drefs were not of the fame substance. One of their ideas was exceedingly natural, on observing the white skin intermixed with the blue veins, they sup posed the latter to be the effects of tatooing. But nothing afforded them greater furprise than the fight of two dogs belonging to the ship, which immediately on their approach, set up a loud bark to the great delight of the natives, who answered them in a shout almost as violent; in these animals, they took great delight, as, except a few grey rats, there are no quadrupeds on the island. Captain Wilson was exceedingly anxious to keep them ignorant of the nature and use of fire-arms; but one one of them accidentally picking up a small leaden bullet, surprised at its weight, examined the Malay about it, who requested one of our musquets, to explain it by, to him. They seemed very desirous that one of the English should go with them in their canoes to their King, that he might fee what fort of people they were. Every one agreed that it would be right for fome person to go; but as difficulties arose concerning who the person should be, the Captain requested his brother, Mr Matthias Wilson, who readily consented; and about noon one of the canoes left the harbour, having Mr Wilson with them: the other canoe, withfour persons, among whom was Raa Kook, the elder of the King's brothers, and who was also General of his armies, remained with our people, of their own accord, until the canoe returnturned ed with Mr Wilson. The Captain directed his brother to acquaint the King who they were; to relate to him, as well as he could, the nature of their misfortune; to solicit his friendship and protection, and permission to build a vessel to carry them back to their own country. He also sent a present by him to the King, of a small remnant of blue broad cloath, a canister of tea, another of sugar-candy, and a jar of rusk: the last article was added at the particular request of the King's two brothers.

Those who remained behind, observing that our people had much trouble to procure the fresh water which they had occasion for, conducted them across a narrow part of the island, where it was more plentiful; and the road to it being rugged and difficult, they carried Mr Sharp, a youth of about sifteen years of age, who was sent on this duty, over the most difficult parts, in their arms; and were very careful also in assisting the men, in those places, who brought two jars of water from the well.

The weather remained as bad as ever all the next night; but grew better in the morning; and about 10 o'clock one of the boats went to the wreck. When they got there, they found that some of the natives had been on board; and that they had carried off some ironwork, and other things; and in particular, that they had rummaged the medicine-cheft, and tasted several of the medicines, which being probably not very palatable, they had thrown out the contents, and carried off the bottles. This circumstance was made known to Raa Kook by the Captain, not fo much by way of complaint, asto express his uneafiness for the confequences which might arise to the natives from their having tasted, or perhaps drank, fuch a variety of medicines. Raa Kook's countenance fully described the indignation he felt at the treacherous behaviour of his countrymen; defiring that if they caught any of them attempting again to plunder the veffel, they would kill them, and he would justify the English to his brother for having done so: and he begged that Captain Wilson would entertain no uneasiness whatever on account of what the plunderers might suffer, because it would be entirely owing to their own misconduct.

The same evening, Captain Wilson made a proposition to his officers, the boldness and wisdom of which, and the resolution manifested in its execution, reslect the highest honour on him and them, while the unanimity and cheerfulness cheerfulness displayed by the crew in acceding to it, equally redound to their credit. Every one who knows any thing of seamen, knows that their grog " is the folace and joy of their lives;". -that their grog softens all their hardships, and causes even the horrors of war to pass by them unfelt;—that there is no undertaking fo dangerous, or fo desperate, that they will not most readily attempt for it, nor scarcely a comfort in life that they will not forego rather than relinquish it. Yet Captain Wilson finding them rather noisy when they returned from the wreck, (owing to a little strong liquor which the officer who was then on duty had given them, and which coming after long toil, and on an empty stomach, had operated powerfully, rather from these circumstances than from the quantity which they had drank), it alarmed him

fo much, that he submitted to his officers the propriety of staving (with the consent of the people) every cask of liquor which was in the ship. He knew it was too bold a step to be taken without their confent, and was fully aware of the difficulty of obtaining it; but he trufted to the regard which they had for him, and his influence over them; and he intended to make the people themselves the executioners of his purpose, while they were yet warm with the project. He had the fatisfaction to find that his officers immediately acquiesced, and the next morning he called all the crew together, and told them he had fomething to propose, in which their future welfare, nay, perhaps, their preservation, was most materially involved. He then submitted to their judgment the measure on which he and his officers had deliberated ted the evening before; urged the propriety of it in the most forcible terms, as a step which would best authorise the hope of deliverance from their prefent situation, and of seeing once more their own country, and those who were dear to them; --- and he added, that however reluctantly they might yield to the proposition, yet they could not but be fatisfied that the understanding of every individual amongst them must, on reflection, perceive that it was a meafure absolutely necessary to be adopted. The moment he concluded, all the failors, with the utmost unanimity, and to their lasting honour as men, replied, that however they might fuffer from being deprived of their accustomed recruit of liquor, yet being sensible, that having eafy access to it, they might not at all times use it with discretion, they gave their full affent to the Captain's propofal; proposal; and added, that they were ready to go directly to the ship, and stave every cask of liquor on board. This they most conscienciously performed; and so scrupulously did they execute their trust, that there was not a single man among them who would take even a farewel glass of his beloved cordial.

During the absence of Matthias Wilson, they had an opportunity of getting more intimately acquainted with Raa Kook, whom they found a most amiable character indeed. Observing a piece of polished bone around his wrist, they took occasion to enquire into the meaning of it. He informed them, it was a mark of great distinction, conferred only on the Blood Royal, and principal officers of state; and that he enjoyed it as being the King's brother and commander in chief of the forces both by fea and land. Raa Kook's friendship friendship was therefore cultivated with all imaginable affiduity, and he in return thowed himself attached to them by a most attentive politeness; he imitated them in all their actions, and on every occasion shewed them how high an opinion he had formed of them. The Malay on his first arrival had requested the use of some cloathing which was readily granted, and an uniform coat with trowlers were at same time given to Raa Kook, who put them on, but soon wearied of them, as he found them cumbersome. of He examined into the most minute action, and was at no little pains to learn from the cook, the method of blowing up the fire with a noes arrived, in which were Arra Kooker, the King's other brother, and one of the King's fons. They informed Capt.

FI.

W.

W. that his brother was on his way back; but that the canoe in which he was, could not make so much speed against the wind as theirs, which occasioned the delay. The King by their means, offered them a hearty welcome to his territories, and assured them of his friendship and protection; he also defired them to build a veffel in any part of the island they inclined, and that he and his subjects would willingly afford them every assistance in their power. Raa Kook then took his nephew and introduced him particularly to the Captain and his officers; and conducted him round the cove, explained every thing agreeable to the information he himself had just received, and feemed mightily pleafed with his friend's aftonishment. This young man was very well made, but had a flit in his nose, probably the consequence of a wound in battle. CVIT al

In the forenoon two boats were difpatched to the wreck. They found a number of the natives in about 20 canoes busied in examining the vessel; these Raa Kook soon dispatched, and on this as well as every occasion did every thing in his power to convince the English of his protection and friendship.

Meantime the people were highly entertained with Arra Kooker, who proved to be a most facetious entertaining man; possessing uncommon talents for mimickry and humour; he described by many diverting signs the terror of Matthias Wilson while at Pelew; indeed he had been under very great apprehension; but they were all revived with his appearance, and the account he gave them of his embassy, in nearly the following words:

On the approach of the canoe in which

which I went to the island where the King lives, a vast concourse of the natives ran out of their houses to see me come on shore. The King's brother took me by the hand, and led me up to the town, where a mat was spread for me, on a square pavement, and I was directed to fit down on it. In a little time the King appeared, and being pointed out to me by his brother, I rose and made my obeisance after the manner of Eastern nations, by lifting my hands to my head, and bending my body forward; but he did not feem to pay any attention to it. I then offered him the presents which my brother had sent by me, and he received them in a very His brother now gracious manner. talked a great deal to him, the purport of which, as I conceived, was to acquaint him with our difaster, and the number of us; after which the King ate ate some of the sugar-candy, seemed to relish it, and distributed a little of it to several of his chiefs, and then directed all the things to be carried to his own house. This being done, he ordered refreshments to be brought for me: the first consisted of a cocoa-nut shell of warm water, sweetened with molasses: after tasting it, he directed a little boy, who was near him, to climb a cocoa-nut tree, and gather some fresh nuts; he cleared one of them from the hulk, and after tasting the milk of it, bad the boy present it to me, making figns for me to drink the milk, and then return the nut to him; and when I had done so, he broke the shell in two, ate a little of the meat, and then returned it to me to eat the rest. A great crowd of the natives had by this time furrounded me, who were curious and eager to examine my clothes and

and person; but as it began to be dark, the King, his brother, myself, and several others, retired into a large house, where supper was brought in, consisting of yams boiled whole, and others boiled and beaten together, as we sometimes do potatoes; there were likewise fome shell fish, but I could not determine what they were. After supper I was conducted to another house, at some distance from the first, by a female. Here I found at least forty or fifty men and women; and figns were made for me to sit or lie down on a mat, which feemed spread on purpose for me to fleep on: and after all the company had fatisfied themselves with viewing me, they went to fleep, and I laid myself down on the mat, and rested my head on a log, which these people use as a pillow, and drew another mat, which also seemed laid for the purpose, purpose, over me. I was unable even to flumber, but lay perfectly still; and some considerable time after, when all was quiet, about eight men arose, and made two great fires at each end of the house, which was not divided by partitions, but formed one large habitation. This operation of theirs, I confess alarmed me very much indeed! I thought of nothing less, than that they were going to roast me, and that they had only laid themselves down, that I might drop afleep, for them to dispatch me in that situation. However, as there was no possibility of escaping the mischief, if any were intended, I collected all my fortitude, and recommended myself to the Supreme Disposer of all events. I lay still, expecting every moment to meet my fate; but, to my great furprise, after sitting a while to warm themselves, I perceived 1) 2 that that they all retired again to their mats, and stirred no more till day-light. I then got up, and walked about, furrounded by great numbers of men, women, and children; and, in a little time, was joined by the King's brother, who took me to feveral houses, in every one of which I was entertained with yams, cocoa-nuts, and fweetmeats. I was afterwards conducted to the King, to whom I fignified, by figns, that I wished much to return to my brother: he understood me perfectly, and explained to me, by figns also, that the canoes could not go out, on account of the great wind. I fpent the remainder of the day in walking about the island, and observing its produce, which confisted chiefly of yams and cocoanuts: the former they cultivate with great care, in large plantations, which are all in swampy watery ground, such as the rice grows in, in India. The cocoa-nuts grow chiefly about their houfes, as does also the beetle-nut, which they chew as tobacco."

The favourable account which Mr Wilson brought, joined to the message the King had sent to the Captain by his brother and son, put all our people into great spirits; so that they applied to their several avocations with redoubled vigour, and particularly to getting every thing they could from the wreck.

The number of the visitants increafing very fast, Captain Wilson judged it prudent to set a watch, their guests being previously apprised, lest the turning out suddenly under arms should occasion an alarm. Captain Wilson had kept all his crew under a regular course of exercise, so that they were very expert in handling their musquets, to the no small surprise of Raa Kook and the natives, who were thus impressed with a very favourable opinion of the power and abilities of their visitants.

Arra Kooker, as has been already hinted, was a most extraordinary character; he possessed expressive features, that conveyed his meaning, though totally ignorant of his expressions. He was a man apparently about forty years of age; quite plump or rather round; he attempted at one time to wear trowfers, but found them very disagreeable; but was remarkably fond of a white linen shirt. One of the dogs was his great favourite, and whenever he approached him, the animal leaped and frisked about with every demonstration of joy. His talents for mimickry were fo great that he foon discovered many fingularities about the strangers, whereby they were distinguishable from one another, and kept them all in spirits.

Thus, by the kindness of Providence were these unhappy men, brought from a state of the greatest distress, to a situation at least tolerable; indeed, had it not been for the dread of not accomplishing the building of another vessel to carry them to China, and thus being for ever deprived, in all human probability, of seeing their friends, their families, and country, they might have spent their time very comfortably.

CHAP. II.

The King Visits them—Reception and Behaviour—Examines everything, and is pleased—Farther Proceedings.

ON the 15th, the English were informed that the King was coming; and foon after they saw a great number of canoes canoes turning the point which formed the harbour; but the King stopped as foon as he got within the bay, and directed one squadron of the canoes, which were all armed, to retire to the back of the island; thinking, probably, that so great a number of armed people would create an alarm among the strangers. He then came forward with the rest, in great form, and with much parade, as far as the tide, which was then low, would permit them; and it was fignified to Captain Wilson, by the King's brothers, that he should then go and meet him. Accordingly two of his own people took him on their shoulders, and carried him through the water to the King's canoe, which he was requested to enter; and he and the King, whose name was Abba Thulle, embraced one another. The Captain then related the nature nature of their misfortune to Abba Thulle, by means of the two Malays, and repeated his request to be permitted to build a vessel to carry them home; and the King again gave his permission for them to build it, either where they were, or at the island where he refided; but recommended the latter, adding, that the island on which they had landed was unhealthy, which was the reason it was not inhabited; and that he apprehended they would be ill when another wind began to blow. The Captain informed him, that they had a person with them whose. business it was to cure diseases; and that it would be very inconvenient to them if they removed farther from the wreck of their vessel, because they could not then procure from her fuch things as they might want, without much trouble and loss of time. To these these reasons the King assented; and making figns that he wished to land, the Captain was carried on shore by his people, and Abba Thulle, stepping into the water, followed him. On his landing, he looked about him with a good deal of apparent fuspicion, which however was foon removed. Raa Kook made up to him, and a fail being spread for him agreeable to their practice, the chiefs of his company sat also down. forming a square; and his other attendants, to the amount of about 300 inclosed them in a circle, squatting down at same time in such a position as that they could rife in a twinkling. Captain Wilson made him a present, of a piece of cloth and some ribbons, which seemed to please him very much. He was quite naked, as well as his brothers, and without any bone on his wrift, or other ornament; he carried a hatchet of Iron on his shoulder, which was so adapted to it, that it gave him no inconvenience.

Abba Thulle, the King, was introduced by Captain Wilson to the officers and all his men, and upon being told that Mr Benger was fecond in command, he designed him the Kickaray Rupack, supposing Captain Wilson to be the King of some country; but when he was made to understand, that he belonged to a mighty Sovereign, and that he was only his Captain, he readily got hold of the word Captain, by which name he constantly faluted him afterwards, and Mr Benger, Kickaray Captain. The King then enquired for Captain Wilson's badge of supremacy, which put him to a stand; luckily Mr Benger slipped his ring into his hand, which being produced, and the manner of wearing it shewn, pleased Abba Thulle Thulle not a little, as it carried some affinity to their ornament of the bone.

Raa Kook, having as before-menti--oned, examined every thing belonging to the English, very minutely, took much pains in pointing them out to the King; they went through the tents, in which every thing furprised them; nor did the difference between the Chinese and English escape their notice. Raa Kook at same time gave his brother to understand, that there were many different nations and classes of mankind on the earth; who were frequently at war with one another, as he often was with his neighbouring Island-Abba Thulle appeared to despise the Chinese exceedingly because they had no musquets.

But nothing feemed to strike Abba Thulle with more astonishment than the fire-arms, with which Raa Kook endeavoured endeavoured to make him acquainted. He expressed much anxiety to see them used, which Captain Wilson ordered immediately to be done. He defired Mr Benger to cause the sailors go thro' their exercise ranked up on the sea beach, being then low water, while he explained their motions to the King. The men went through various evolutions, with great readiness, marching backwards and forwards, and concluded with three vollies. The astonishment and furprise of the natives on hearing the report of the musquets is not easily conceived; indeed, their hooting and hallooing made a noise little inserior to it. Captain Wilson judged it expedient to be guilty of a little profusion of their powder, on this occasion, in order to impress the minds of the natives, with a more enlarged idea of the power of the English; a design which was fully answered by it. But still further to shew them the effects of their firearms, Mr Benger ordered one of the live doves which they had, to be let loose, at which he fired and immediately brought it down, with a leg and wing broken. This surpassed every thing in their estimation; indeed, they now seemed to have lost themselves in wonder and amazement.

Raa Kook was by this time pretty well acquainted with any articles the English had about them, which he took great pains in pointing out to the King, his brother; those that seemed principally to draw their notice, were, a Grinding-Stone, which they turned round with great satisfaction, observing the effect of it upon pieces of iron; they also examined the tents, and the few culinary articles the English had. But the dogs were the greatest est fund of entertainment to them; with whose barking they were so much delighted, that they kept a continual uproar with them, and it was found necessary to confine them. The King also examined the English as to their provisions, and got a piece of ham and a live goose.

Abba Thulle was vastly pleased with what he had seen, and proposed going away. This was notified to his attendants by a loud shriek from one of his officers, which gave not a little alarm to the English; it was instantaneously obeyed; the whole rushing to their canoes with great alacrity, and the King with the greater part of the natives took leave of them.

Raa Kook remained with the English all night, as did the King's son and a few of their attendants; Captain Wilson ordered two tents to be pitch-E 2 ed.

ed, one for the principal people, and the other for the commonalty. He continued himfelf with Raa Kook and his party, after the guard was fet for some hours. The natives in the distant tent anxious to pay all attention to their vifitors, prepared to fing a fong in their way. Their method of tuning their voices for this purpose, was attended with founds fo very dissonant and harsh, that the English thought they were beginning their war-hoop, or giving a fignal to the King and those with him to attack them. Impressed with this idea, every man seized his musquet and ran to the tent where Captain Wilfon was, supposing him to be in the most imminent danger. There they were undeceived and attended to the fong which was conducted in the following manner; a chief gave out the line, which a company next him took up and completed the verse, the last line they repeated, and it was taken up by the next party, who also sung a verse. They continued their song some time, and made signs for our people to repay them in kind, which was done by a lad, named Cobbledick, to their great satisfaction. The manner of this lad's singing was afterwards mentioned to the King, who, upon hearing him, was so much pleased, that he never met with him afterwards, without desiring him to sing.

We come now to mention a circumstance, which presents these natives of Pelew in a light that could not have been pre-conceived; a circumstance which discovers such nice feelings, as on the one hand displays human nature in a very pleasing attire, in this her native dress; while on the other, it may put to the blush enlightened nations

E 3 and

and individuals. The English had no other means for again revisiting their native homes, but by constructing a fmall schooner; and for this purpose, had only a few instruments saved from the wreck: these they carefully concealed from the natives, who had shewn a particular attachment to iron and instruments made of that metal. Accidentally, a chief had observed where they were, and requested a cutlass from Captain Wilson: the Captain was loth to part with it, but fearing worse consequences in case he refused, thought it best to give it. As they went out of the tent Raa Kook observed it with great displeasure, took it from him, and returned it to Captain Wilson. In a few hours the Malay coming ashore, told the Captain he had given great offence by offering a cutlass to an inferior officer and neglecting the King

King and his brothers. In order to make up matters, Captain Wilson thought it best to present each of the King's brothers with some cloth and ribbons, which were very coolly received—they feemed to be unhappy. In the afternoon, the King came round from the back part of the island where he had spent the night, and Captain Wilson went out in the jolly boat with Tom Rose to meet him. Now Abba Thulle who had been fo happy and pleafed the day before, appeared with a gloomy referve, and the poor Englishmen trembled in anticipating the dreadful effects of his displeasure which they thought he was meditating. But the real cause of the uneafiness which evidently depressed them all, was nothing more than a struggle in their own breafts, how they should ask a favour, from strangers almost wholly in in their own power, without having the appearance of a command. A neighbouring nation had injured them, and as they meant to attack them in battle in a few days, they very justly foresaw the advantages which would arise from the presence of a few of the English failors with their fire-arms. At length with much evident confusion, Abba Thulle hinted it to Captain Wilson, who immediately affured him, he might at any time command his men, who were entirely at his fervice. No fooner was this answer notified by the interpreter, than every countenance brightened up, and cordiality and happiness were restored. The King, immediately dubbed the Captain a brother Rupack, intreated him to send some of his * people to the part of the island where he lived, to carry him whatever provifions they needed, and concluded with affuring affuring him, that his people were entirely at his service, to affist in constructing their vessel or any thing else in their power. He immediately retired to the opposite side of the island, promising to return next morning for the men. Nor was the happy fettlement of this affair less agreeable to the English than the natives; the fear of having incurred the displeasure of those whose favour was so necessary, had distressed them not a little, and they accordingly were every one more zealous than his neighbour to be chosen for this fervice; the following five were appointed, Mr Cummin 3d mate, Madan Blanchard, Nicholas Tyacke, Jas. Bluett and Thomas Dutton. They accordingly fet off next morning, properly armed and accoutered, Abba Thulle, infifting on leaving four of his attendants by way of hostages.

It is a rule among merchant ships, that in case of shipwreck, all superiority of rank or command ceases, and every individual becomes his own mafter, and may shift as he can for himfelf; but as they were now preparing to build a vessel, they agreed to form themselves as the people of a dock-yard, and appoint their beloved Captain sole Manager and Director, which was done. Mr Barker who had in his younger years been employed about a dock-yard, designed a plan for the vessel which was agreed to be a schooner, and all heartily and cordially proceeded to the different occupations affigned them; fome in felling trees, others carrying them to the dock, while the greater part were engaged in dreffing them, &c. Their spirits now revived with the prospect of deliverance, and all feemed but as one man, having only one object in view. The

The fituation of these unhappy people opens a wide field for reflection; many circumstances rendered it very questionable how far it was practicable to complete their schooner; and if they failed, all views of happiness or comfort in this life, they confidered as at an end; yet so animated were they with the hope of fuccess, none gave way to desponding, but every one looked forward with rapture to the finishing of their new vessel, as the fummum bonum which they were capable of enjoying. The Antelope being fixed and fluck to the coral reef, they had opportunity of getting from her various articles which greatly expedited their undertaking. One day they observed a green branch tied to the mast head, this they afterwards learned was a fignal to any canoes that might be straggling gling about, that the King was gone to war, and they should follow.

The boats paid a daily visit to the wreck, from which they got many valuable articles. They one day brought with them two casks of beef, and a small cask of arrack which had been overlooked when the spirits were staved. As they now underwent excessive labour and fatigue, Captain Wilson thought it prudent to allow every man a small quantity of grog, which was a valuable cordial to them.

By Sunday the 24th of August, they had got the keel laid on the blocks, and the stem and stern post bolted. Captain Wilson therefore ordered every man to attend public prayers and thanksgivings to God for all his kindness to them, a practice which was continued every Sunday evening thereafter during their stay on the island.

Next

Next day they kept a holiday, having already christened their embryo of a vessel, The Relief, and every man received a double quantity of grog on the occasion.

About this time also they raised a fort of rampart or barricade in front of the tents towards the sea; on the inside they had a foot bank on which they could stand and fire one of the six pounders which they had brought from the wreck; and by this means, with the assistance of two swivels, also mounted on the barricade, they were pretty well prepared to defend the entrance of the cove.

Nine days had now elapsed since the five Englishmen had left Oroolong with Abba Thulle, and there had been no news from them since, although it was expected, they would have returned within five days; their friends were therefore therefore not a little anxious about them. Captain Wilson, uncertain to what cause to attribute their stay, agreed with his comrades in a proposal they made, to settle a plan of defence within the barricade, and to open a communication from one tent to another, through which they could join or retreat in case of an attack.

In the afternoon of Monday the 25th the five men returned, accompanied by Raa Kook, with a prefent of yams, co-coa-nuts and sweet-meats. Mr Cummin gave the following account of their expedition.

"They spent the night after their departure from the cove, in an island about six leagues to the eastward; and next day arrived at Pelew, which is about four miles distant. Here they spent some days, while the natives were collecting their canoes. On the morning of the 21st they were all assembled, to the amount of more than 1000 men, in about 150 canoes; the English were separated in five different canoes. Early in the afternoon they came in fight. of the enemy, when Raa Kook, having Thomas Dutton in his canoe, went close in by the town and spoke to the enemy for some time. His harangue they heard with indifference, when he immediately threw a spear, which was instantly returned; Dutton then fired, and a man fell, to the great confusion. of the enemy. This was speedily followed by a few more shots, and Abba. Thulle was foon left mafter of the field. The flight was all the mark of victory wished for; and all the trophies they desired, were a few cocoa-nuts and yams. After the engagement, the fleet returned homeward; the King called at feveral places by the way, where F the 11 4

the women brought out sweet-meat liquor to drink. They did not reach Pelew till seven o'clock next evening, having spent the preceding night in various small creeks on the way. On their landing the English fired a volley and gave three cheers, to the great entertainment of the natives. rejoicings took place throughout the island, and every mark of attention and respect was paid to the English. The King took them to his own house, treated them with stewed turtle, thanked them most politely for their affistance, and enquired at Mr Cummin, whether he could have ten men to affift him in another expedition he had in view; Mr Cummin referred him to Captain Wilson as he had no authority, and departed very much pleased with the expedition. They landed on the island where they had spent the first 8. 4 4 night night, were again most hospitably entertained, and returned next morning to their companions. This evening they spent with much festivity, the absentees had their nine days complement of arrack measured out to them, and together with the yams and cocoanuts made themselves happier than a few days before they could have supposed it possible for them to be. Mr Cummin described the arms of the natives as confisting of darts from five to eight feet long, pointed and bearded with the wood of the beetle-nut tree, which they use when closely engaged; when they fight at a distance, they use short ones, which by means of an elastic piece of bamboo, they throw at a particular object with furprifing dexterity."

On the morning of the 27th, some of the hands were dispatched in the jolly boat to the watering place, and to cast the seine, which they did without fuccess. As the day was pleasant, two or three of them proposed to return over land, and accordingly fet out; the remainder returned to the cove in the boat. Night drew on and no tidings of the travellers. People were immediately dispatched with lanthorns to traverse the country in search of them. They halloed as they went along, and luckily discovered the benighted travellers, resting on the very brink of a precipice, over which they must unavoidably have fallen, had not the lights appeared at the critical moment they

Raa Kook now informed Captain Wilson, that the King his brother, bestowed on the English the island on which they were, named by the natives Oroolong; the Captain accordingly hoisted the British pendant, and took possession fession for the English; firing three vollies of small arms, as an instrument of possession. Raa Kook likewise requested Captain Wilson to pay a visit to his brother at Pelew, which from the many things he had to attend to at Oroolong, the Captain was obliged to decline: but he dispatched in his room, Mr Benger the first mate, his own brother Mr Matthias Wilson, and Tom Rose, to compliment the King on his late victory. He also sent one of the Chinese, who are all great botanists, to examine the natural productions of the island. They were received by the King and his people with great hospitality; and entertained with fongs in which the word Englees was often repeated, feeming to refer to the late engagement, of which they had a grateful recollection; Abba Thulle mentioned to Mr Benger a more formidable expedition which he expected the affiftance of the English. Mr Benger said their houses were very comfortable, surrounded with plantations of yams and cocoanuts; they have no corn of any kind, although the soil appeared to be very rich. They have no cattle nor quadrupeds but rats. The Chinese gave a very poor account of the island, in which he found nothing to his mind.

Captain Wilson now set out in the boat, to survey the island which he had got possession of, the whole circumference of which he judged did not exceed three miles. On the north side it is all covered with trees and a steep rock hangs prominent upon the sea. There is a fine sandy beach on the west side, as well as a fine plain between the hills and the sea. The south side is rocky like the north; but in several veral interior parts of the island, especially towards the west, there are evident traces of its having formerly been inhabited.

CHAP III.

Captain Wilson visits Pelew—Manners of the natives— Ten Men sent with them to battle—Battle of Artingall—Raa Kook visits Oroolong for more men— Death and suneral of the King's Son.

ON Sunday the 31st of August, Captain Wilson resolved to pay his long intended visit to Pelew; and accordingly went about prayers in the morning, previous to his setting out. Though it did not appear during all the time the English were about these islands, that the natives had any religious ceremonies, it is remarkable that on this as well as several other occasions, they paid gave no disturbance to the English when so employed; but paid the greatcst attention to what they saw, and behaved with the utmost decency. Mr. Devis, Mr Sharp and Harry Wilson accompanied the Captain on this visit; The English in their jolly boat, attended by Raa Kook and other natives in a canoe. As a mark of the uncommon attention which Raa Kook on all occasions paid them, the following circumstance may be noticed. About noon, when they were as yet three or four miles distant from Pelew, he paddled off with all expedition to a little town by the water edge, from whence he brought them, what provisions he could procure, to refresh them. About I o'clock they reached Pelew; fired fix musquets and fixed their colours in the ground at the end of the causeway where they landed. Raa Kook conducted ducted them to a house where they waited the arrival of Abba Thulle. Meantime the natives thronged into the house to have a peep at the English, bringing along with them various refreshments and sweet-meats. In a little it was notified that the King was at hand, when, notwithstanding the multitude then present, the greatest silence prevailed. On his arrival, Captain Wilson embraced him as at first meeting, and presented him with a few trinkets, which were very agreeably received.

Abba Thulle now proposed to conduct them to the town, which is about a quarter of a mile from the landing place, where they were. The English, in order to assume some little formality, carried their colours before them. They passed through a wood, and then came to a fine pavement or causeway; there there are large broad stones laid in the middle for the ease of walking, and lesfer ones on the sides; this led them to the town, where they were conducted to a large square pavement, surrounded by houses. In the centre stood a larger house than the rest, which was allotted to the English for their accommodation. In it there were a number of women, of a superior rank, being wives to the Rupacks or principal officers of state, who received them very politely and prefented them with cocoa-nuts and fweet drink of which all partook.

In a little the King, after a suitable apology to Captain Wilson, retired to bathe, and a message was sent from the Queen, expressing a wish to be favoured with the company of the English at her house; thither they all repaired, and were seated in a little square before the

the house. It appeared that this lady was the principal wife of Abba Thulle, (for he had others,) great attention being paid to her by all; the King resided almost constantly at her house. She appeared at the window, and by means of Raa Kook, examined into the various peculiarities in the appearance of the English which struck her. She fent them a broiled pigeon, which is the greatest rarity the island produces, and is held in the highest estimation; it is unlawful for any but Rupacks and their wives to taste them. After satisfying her curiofity, they were conducted by the General to his house, where they met with a very different reception, and had an opportunity of observing the benevolent heart of this worthy man in domestic life. In his house they were treated with the greatest kindness, and with the most expressive tokens tokens of real welcome; but what particularly warmed their hearts on this occasion, was the endearing behaviour of Raa Kook to his wife and children. These last he fondled on his knees and encouraged with all the genuine marks of parental affection. The night was now pretty far advanced, when they retired to their house, where their friend the General spared no pains to render their accommodation comfortable. He procured plenty of mats for them to fleep on, kindled fires to defend them from the mosquitos and damps, and ordered some of his own men to fleep at the other end to protect them from any of the natives, who might be led to disturb them from motives of curiofity. Next morning they were attended as usual by Raa Kook, and after walking about for fome time, were ordered to attend the King to breakfast in the Queen's house where they had been the day before. They were received with a peculiar etiquette, which was never afterwards practifed. The house was all in one apartment; at the one end of which hung a screen of mats which when drawn up discovered the King and Queen feated. They breakfasted on yams and fish very agreeably. After breakfast Mr Sharp the furgeon, accompanied by Mr Devis, fet out to visit a child of Arra Kook's, which was fick. His house was about three miles distant; this gave them an opportunity of examining the country, which they had not before done. This visit was very acceptable, and the Rupack thought he could not fufficiently repay them. Mr Sharp examined the child's body, which was almost covered with ulcers, but could not prefcribe any thing, having no medicines. He G 2 approved approved of the mode of cure they had adopted, which was chiefly fomenta-Arra Kook then laded feveral servants with provisions, &c. in baskets, to be fent to the boats, and affured them when they left the island, they should have his whole rookery of pigeons. This by the way, was the greatest compliment he could offer them, in his estimation, and sufficiently shews the uncommon gratitude with which his bosom was warmed-indeed, the readers will on many occasions have anticipated the remark, that the finer feelings and virtues which adorn humanity, shone in these natives in no common degree. They returned to Captain Wilson at Pelew the same evening.

The request which had been repeatedly mentioned by Abba Thulle, was now formally made to Captain Wilson, by desire of a council of Rupacks, viz.

that he would allow them ten men to accompany them to a fecond engagement at Artingall, which was most readily complied with; Captain Wilfon mentioned at fame time that it would be obliging were the men detained as fhort time as possible, not to hinder the progress of their schoon= er; to this Abba Thulle most engagingly replied, "That it was not his wish to detain them longer than was absolutely necessary, but after doing him fo much fervice, he behoved to keep them a day or two to rejoice with him." The council had met in the forenoon on this business; every Rupack or chief was feated on a stone, that for the King being higher than the rest, and disputed from side to side as it happened, without any regular order of speakers; it appeared that every thing was decided by a majority, fo G 3 that that their government bears no small affinity to our own.

The remainder of the time the English spent at Pelew, was very agreeably employed. One day when in company with a great number of the natives, Mr Devis, who was an excellent draughtsman, took out his pencil, and was bufily employed in taking the likeness of a woman who drew his attention; the lady observing him, and ignorant of his intention, retired in great confusion. A chief beside him, noticing the drawing, was greatly pleased and shewed it to the King, who immediately ordered two women to come forward and stand in a proper position for Mr Devis to take their likeness. Devis foon finished his sketches and presented them to the King who was highly entertained, and calling the women shewed them their portraits, with which

which they were much pleafed. Abba Thulle then defired Mr Devis to give him his pencil and paper, on which he scratched a few figures, very rudely, but sufficiently to shew his conception of what had been done. So that while he thus displayed his own inferiority to the Artist, he at same time gave evident proofs of the sense these qualifications which so pleafed him.

Captain Wilson and his companions were carried to see their method of building canoes, by which means they saw some canoes which were just returned from a skirmish, in which they had proved victorious; they had captured a canoe, which was considered as great a trophy, as a first rate man of war would be in Britain. On this occasion the English had an opportunity of observing their method of celebrating such exploits, or keeping a day of festivity. There was a great feast prepared for the warriors, previous to which they danced in the following manner. They ornamented themselves with plantain leaves, nicely paired into stripes, like our ribbons, which being of a yellowish colour, had a good effect on their dark skins; then forming themselves into circles, one within another, an elderly person began a fong, or long fentence, (for they were not certain which,) and on his coming to the end of it, all the dancers joined in concert, dancing along, at fame time; then a new fentence was pronounced and danced to, which continued till every one had fung, and his verfe been danced to. Their manner of dancing, is not so much capering and leaping, or other feats of agility, as a certain method.

method of reclining their bodies and yet preserving their ballance. During the dance sweet drink was handed about, and when it was finished, an elegant supper was brought in.

Mr Sharp carried Captain Wilson one afternoon to see his favourite Arra Kook, who received them with great joy, and entertained them very kindly. They went through many plantations on their way, and were much furprised to find the country fo highly cultivated. They observed a tree named by the natives Ri'a'mall, which the English supposed to be a species of the bread-fruit. After enjoying plentifully this good man's bounty, they returned to Pelew, highly delighted with their agreeable excursion. In the course of any observations they had opportunity of making, they found the employment of the men generally to be making They making darts, hewing trees, &c. while the women, looked after the yams, wrought the mats and baskets, nursed their children and dressed the victuals.

On Thursday the 4th of September they left Pelew, loaded with presents, and amidst the loud acclammations of a vast number of the natives. They arrived safe at the cove about nine in the evening and found all their companions well and proceeding in their work with the utmost alacrity. The Captain immediately informed them of the request the natives had made for ten men, and every one was anxious to be of the party; at length they were determined upon, and ordered to be in readiness on a call.

Elevated with the prospect of happily attaining that great point to which their most fanguine wishes were directed, there was only one thing which they they dreaded, and that was, whether they could find a passage with sufficiency of water to carry them through the reef; this Captain Wilson set out in search of, and luckily discovered a narrow opening, where there was about three seet and a half water, so that at spring tides which rise about nine seet, they could depend on at least twelve feet, which was considerably more than their schooner could draw.

In the afternoon of Sunday the 7th of September some canoes touched at the cove, bringing with them some fresh sish, which they bartered for iron; and the following day the King arrived, attended by his brothers, the Prime Minister, and several other chiefs; they also brought sish, especially some of a species, which they had not seen before, but which when boiled, proved very palatable. It measures about three feet feet in length, and one foot across, the flesh is very firm like a large cod.

During this visit, the King examined every thing with more attention than before, besides many new objects of furprise were now to be seen. The Smith and his forge proved a matter of great astonishment, never did a conjuror keep an audience in fuch furprise and consternation, as the finith did the natives with his fire, bellows, and anvil; fo enamoured were they with the red hot iron, that they could not be prevented from catching the sparks, though many suffered in the attempt. Nor did the Cooper and his casks escape their enquiries; the dispatch with which he hooped and inclosed a barrel, feemed to them the effect of some supernatural power: in short, every thing feemed to furprise so much, and drew so many spectators, that the workmen could could not keep elbow room, and were of course much impeded in their work. Captain Wilson had therefore to use many stratagems to entice away the chiefs, and Raa Kook, was obliged to interpose his authority to keep the natives at a distance. The barricade which had been erected fince the King's last visit, was a matter of much surprise, they examined the breast work with attention, and did not fail to enquire the use of the fix pounder and great gun; the Captain did his best to explain the use of them, giving him to understand, that were the people of Artingall, or any other enemies to approach the cove, they could blow them to pieces; and in like manner by turning the fwivels, he shewed them, that they could defend themselves by land. This information exceeded every thing they had heard; they talked among themselves, and by their gestures and attitudes feemed to be lost in furprise. But the great matter which occupied the attention of all on this visit, was the appearance of the new vessel. The King examined every thing about her with the most minute attention, calling his workmen, and defiring them to notice and profit by what they faw. The power and effects of the iron work, and the ftrong manner in which the whole was bolted and wedged together, furprised the artificers still more than the King; fo that poring into every thing with the most inquisitive eye, they were not more amazed at what they faw done, than to conceive how it was possible to complete the work, so as to keep out water and answer the purposes of navigation. They had an opportunity of observing an instance of great superstition on this occasion. In order to get pieces of wood proper for the different uses for which they were wanted, they had made use of several different kinds; the natives observed one kind in particular which they pointed out to the English, and requested they would not use, as it would certainly prove unlucky. Captain Wilson politely thanked them for their well meant hint, at the same time assuring them he dreaded no harm. The King and his retinue retired as usual to the back of the island and spent the night.

Next morning they returned over land, still full of the idea of the guns, and entreated the Captain to give them a swivel along with them on the expedition; this Captain Wilson shewed him was impracticable, as they required boats, particularly constructed for working them. He then begged to see the fix pounder fired, which was ordered to be done. A scene now ensued which it is not easy to describe. If the firing of the musquets occasioned the surprise of which we lately took notice, how much it was increased on this occasion may be conceived. The process of loading was attended to very particularly, but the flame and the following report perfectly stunned them. They stared at one another for a few feconds, then pushing their fingers into their ears run up and down crying out, the noise being much too violent for the drum of their ears, not accustomed to so loud a noise. This however only ferved to stimulate their wish for having one of the fwivels with them, which they thought would strike such Terror into their enemies, as a long course of years only would efface.

Abba Thulle in the afternoon repeated his request for the swivel, which Captain

Captain Wilson found great difficulty to convince him it was not in his power to give him; indeed he rather sufpected the King and his ministers went away not altogether well pleased with the refusal. Mr Benger therefore who had the command of the party, and had all his men ready drawn up with their arms, ordered them immediately. into the canoes, and they fet fail. Captain Wilson took every opportunity of getting information concerning the neighbouring islands and their situation; the names of the principal were, Artingall, Pellelew and Emillegue.

On Monday the 15th the party returned from the engagement at Artintingall, all well, though some of them had made a very narrow escape; the canoe in which Mr Matthias Wilson and James Duncan were, had been overset by a sudden squall of wind, H 3 whereby whereby both they and four natives along with them had nearly gone to the bottom. Unluckily neither Wilson nor Duncan could swim, but by the vigilance and attention of some of the natives they were got up into a canoe, having kept fast hold of a piece of raft nearly two hours. They brought the agreeable news of having effected another complete victory at Artingall, which Mr Matthias Wilson related in nearly the following manner.

"They reached Pelew the same night they left Oroolong, from whence Abba Thulle wished they should immediately proceed to Artingall; this however, they assured him was impracticable, as it rained hard, and would certainly prove hurtful to the arms; they were all well lodged and entertained. The following evening, they went on board the canoes appointed for them along along with the King, Arra Kooker, Ràa Kook and the other Rupacks, and a great number of the natives; the old men, women and children, followed them to the water fide, when they founded conch shells, to notify their departure to the canoes that were yet in their creeks; these soon assembled to the amount of more than two hundred. They proceeded flowly, the greater part of the night, but stopped at an island on the way, and slept on the ground for three hours before day break. They foon reached Artingall, and halted till the fun was fairly risen, and the enemy had notice of their approach; for, let it not pass unnoticed, it is an established rule in these islands, never to attack an enemy under night or unprepared.

As the King had some days before fent information to Artingall, of his proposed proposed attack, and at the same time terms of peace, he now ordered a canoe with four men in it to proceed to the island, and enquire whether they were to submit or to fight. Each of the heralds had one of the long tail-feathers of the tropic bird stuck upright in their hair, as a fymbol of peace. The messengers foon returned, informing that they refused the terms offered Immediately Abba Thulle ordered the conch to be founded, and waved his chinam stick in the air, the fignal for forming the line of battle. Meantime the enemy collected their. canoes, but kept close by the shore, shewing an evident difinclination to come to battle. Abba Thulle had dreffed himself in the scarlet coat which Captain Wilson had given him, and kept one of the Englishmen in his canoe, the other nine were dispersed through through the fleet in nine different canoes, armed with musquets, cutlasses, bayonets and pistols.

Finding the enemy would not advance, and their present situation being very unfavourable for the attack, the King ordered a party of canoes to go round a neck of high land, and lie there concealed; he then ordered the remainder to exchange a few darts in their present position, and retreat with apparent precipitancy; by these means he expected to draw the enemy from their shores, and the concealed squadron could then get betwixt them and land, and thus hem them in on all hands. He dispatched his orders with great readiness by means of some very swift failing canoes, which cut the water with astonishing velocity. His scheme took place as wished. The enemy rushed out to pursue the apparent fugitives, and

and the canoes coming round the high land, furrounded them on all fides. Those who fled now turned about, and by means of the few fire arms, threw the enemy into terror and confusion. The noise of the musquets, their friends dropping they knew not how, and the triumphant haloo which the natives of Pelew fet up, totally difcomfitted them; they retreated with precipitation, rushed through the canoes that were betwixt them and the land; as there were but few of them, and by that means all escaped but fix canoes and nine natives who were captured. The victory was however confidered as very complete; it is very feldom that any canoes are taken, and two or three prisoners are generally the greatest number. The very dead bodies are carefully carried off the field of battle, left they should fall into the hands of the conquerors to expose them.

The conflict from first to last didnot continue three hours; therefore having paraded round the enemy's shores, sounding the conch shell in signal of desiance, and siring when any of them appeared within musquet shot, the King ordered the canoes to be collected and to return to Pelew.

It now becomes necessary to mention a practice totally inconsistent with that humanity, which has uniformly been pointed out as a most remarkable feature in the character of these natives of Pelew. Notwithstanding the entreaties and remonstrances of the English, nothing could prevent the death of the prisoners. The reason assigned for this barbarous practice was, that they had formerly retained them as slaves, in which capacity they soon got acquainted with their various stores, the creeks and channels of the island, and some-how or other afterwards escaping, made use of the knowledge of the country they had acquired, in assisting them in their depredations; they had therefore found it necessary to kill every person whom the chance of war brought within their power.

All the prisoners had been wounded in the engagement, and seemed to wait their expected fate with great courage. The principal was a Rupack, known by the bone about his wrist; this they endeavoured to wrench from him, but without effect; he struggled to retain it with singular magnanimity; nor did he quit it but died in the contest. His head was stuck on a bamboo, and fixed before the King's house at Pelew.

Mr Benger took great pains to preferve the life of a poor fellow in the canoe noe where he was, and kept him safe for two hours, when one of the King's. people, who had been wounded, fnatched the Malay's dagger from him, and stabbed him, before he could be prevented. Mr Benger observed that the man died very undauntedly, and feemed while in the agonies of death more impressed with the appearance and colour of his new enemy, than what he was fuffering. In the boat where Mr Wilson was, there were two prisoners, one of whom was wounded by a spear in feveral parts of his body, and the other had his thigh broke. When they go to war they knit their hair in a bunch at the crown of the head, and immediately on being captured, they throw it loofe over their faces, waiting the fatal stroke. No sooner did these two victims fignify that they were ready, than they were ordered to fit down:

in the bottom of the canoe, which the lame man readily did and was immediately killed; the other resisted for some time, when one of the natives, snatching Mr Wilson's bayonet, plunged it into his body; he lay for some time weltering in his blood, but never uttered a single groan.

They touched at feveral islands on their way home where the bodies were exposed in triumph; and the inhabitants who were either subjects or allies, rejoiced with them on the occasion. They brought out sweet drink, and other refreshments, and seemed to participate in the general triumph. A vast multitude waited at the landing place of Pelew ready to receive them, loaded with fruit, &c. Great festivity and rejoicings took place immediately, and the praises of the Englees resounded in their songs as formerly."

After

- After the return of the party all hands were kept bufily employed at the schooner, which was now rapidly advancing. They also continued to fend frequently to the wreck, from whence they brought a variety of articles very useful to them. That hunger is an excellent whetter of the appetite, has been often experienced, but never more justly than at present; they discovered about 20 bags of rice in the wreck, which having been fo long under water, would not now boil to a grain, but a jelly, yet they considered it as very favoury food.

The men who returned from the last expedition brought a message from the King, informing Captain Wilson that he would pay him a visit in a few days, to make his acknowledgements for the assistance he had given them; he at same time retained Tom Rose to give him information as to several particulars concerning the English, with which he wished to be acquainted.

Nothing new occurred for feveral days; the weather was exceedingly rainy and stormy, accompanied with frequent and loud thunder. They made feveral attempts to recruit their stock of provisions by sishing, but always in vain; whether it was owing to their ignorance of the proper places, or not using proper bait, Captain Wilfon never could determine.

On the 22d of September, Tom Rose returned from Pelew, bringing with him a quantity of yams, a jar of mollosses, and a particular apology from Abba Thulle, for having so long delayed his intended visit; but many of the neighbouring Rupacks having come to Pelew, to congratulate him on his late victories, he could not leave them without without giving offence; and he could not bring them with him lest it should be inconvenient to the English. There was something peculiarly delicate in all Abba Thulle's behaviour; what education, or refinement could have suggested more real politeness than this message conveyed; anxious on the one hand to avoid any appearance of ingratitude; and on the other, fearful lest his visit should prove prejudicial to those who had served him.

On the evening of the 28th Raa Kook arrived at Oroolong, accompanied by two chiefs of fomeneighbouring islands; they brought a present of cocoa-nuts, yams and molosses. Soon after their arrival, Captain Wilson read prayers, as was usual, every Sunday evening, at which Raa Kook and several of the natives attended; some of them began to talk aloud, and were immediately checked by Raa Kook, who behaved with great decency; while thus employed, the Malay arrived from Pelew with a message to the Captain, which however Raa Kook would not suffer him to deliver, till prayers were ended. Abba Thulle delighted with the fuccess he had already obtained by means of the English, was eager to take advantage of them, while in his territories, to affift him in fubduing his enemies; he therefore defired Raa Kook to request fifteen men, with one of the fwivel guns to go with them in a third grand expedition. Captain Wilfon having feveral things in his mind which had of late given him some uncafiness as to the behaviour of some of the natives, determined to take this opportunity of stating his grievances to Raa Kook, which he accordingly did. He complained of feveral thefts which the

the natives had committed from the wreck; particularly paper, copper, and a fixpounder; he mentioned the inhuman practice of killing all the prisoners, which made the English regret that they should have any concern in their engagements; and lastly, he told him that he was informed Abba Thulle expected the same homage from him and his countrymen which was paid him by his own people. This circumstance had been privately suggested to the English, for no other reason, as it afterwards appeared, than to occasion a difference if possible between the English and the natives of Pelew. Captain Wilson likewise hinted that he considered it as a piece of difrespect to send home his men without a Rupack, or fome person of consequence to attend them. It is not eafy to describe the appearance which Raa Kook's countenance affumed on this information. Shame, vexation and disappointment were each in their turns depicted on it, in a manner much more expressive than any language he could have used. At length after some considerable pause, he affured the Captain, that he would entirely remove any grounds of distrust betwixt them—That as to the articles taken from the ship, they would all be returned, except the paper which had been rendered useless by the rain; the fixpounder had never been taken with an intention to be kept, but that Abba Thulle had fent for it to be shewn to fome of his visitors as a curiofity, and meant certainly to return it. The return of the English without a Rupack had been entirely owing to Mr Benger's hurry, who would not delay his departure a little till things were prepared? He repeated what has been formerly mentioned, mentioned, as their reason for putting the prisoners to death, being a matter not of choice but necessity; at the same time, he agreed to put the prisoners into Captain Wilson's hand to be treated as he should think fit; but what principally distrest him was the idea that his brother should have been represented as expecting homage from the English; this he reprobated as an infamous falsehood. It afterwards appeared that the Malay had been confined fome time for his ingenuity in this lie. This good man's reasoning had a very satisfactory effect, and Captain Wilson having first confulted with his officers, agreed to grant their request, only limiting the number of men from fifteen to ten, as more could not be spared from the work.

Matters being thus agreeably concluded, they fat down to supper with () great pleasure; after which Raa Kook told Mr Sharp he had now a request to make to him, which he hoped he would grant him; and that was, to go along with him to Pelew, to inspect his son's foot, which was very dangeroufly hurt by a spear, which having funk deep into the foot was broke off in attemptingto pull it out; and the barb of the spear having got in among the small bones; they could not extract it. Meantime, his foot swelled amazingly, to the great distress of the young man. One of the natives, reputed among them as a man of skill, began to cut away the slesh; but after mangling his foot in a terrible manner, he was obliged to defift, as the effusion of blood became so great that he could not continue the operation. They therefore had recourse to their mode of fomentation, of which Mr Sharp much approved, and defired it to be continued till he saw him, which he could not propose at this time, three of the ablest men being sick.

Next day about noon, Raa Kook set fail with ten men under the command of Mr Cummin, and in their absence the remainder continued their labours at Oroolong with unremitting assiduity.

Although not directly in the course of the narrative, as the reader's curiosity will no doubt be somewhat raised to learn the sequel of the young man's history just mentioned, we shall next introduce Mr Sharp's account of his excursion to see him.

Immediately on his landing he went directly to the General, his father's house, who met him with visible distress in his countenance.

Mr Sharp acquainted him, that he was come to see his son, and had brought such instruments with him, as would enable him, he hoped, to administer relief. He smiled approbation, and conducted him to his house, where Abba Thulle, and several of the principal people were affembled. After paying his respects to them, Mr Sharp Mas informed, that during Raa Kook's stay at Oroolong, the swelling had subfided by means of the fomentation, and they had forced the spear through his foot, as the only method of extracting it. At this time the whole army was fetting out on the grand expedition, which the young manhearing, could not bear the thoughts of being absent from. He therefore infifted upon being carried to his canoe, where though he could not stand on his feet to fight, he could raise himself so much up as to throw a spear. He therefore went along, and very early in the engagement fell a facrifice to his magnanimity; a spear entering through his throat, occasioned his immediate death. It is impossible to pass over in silence the unhappy fate of this gallant youth. A spirit more truly heroic, history has not left on record; nor need we hesitate to say, that there was more real valour displayed in this action, which accident only has brought on record, than in many feats which have attracted the admiration of many generations.

This also gives us an opportunity of mentioning their mode of burial, to which Mr Sharp was witness on this occasion. Raa Kook desired Mr Sharp and the boatswain to accompany him to the water side, where two canoes were waiting, into which they went, accompanied by about 20 Rupacks, whom they had not formerly seen, as they belonged to another island, tho friendly to Abba Thulle. Mr Sharp Knew knew not whither they were going, but fusfered himself to be conducted by his friend. They landed upon an island about four miles distant from Pelew. They went a little way up into the island, to a small uninhabited village where there were four or five houfes, furrounded by a neat pavement. After resting about an hour here, they fet forward to a town about half a mile distant, where a great many people of both fexes were affembled, and an entertainment prepared. Immediately after this, the women retired; and in a little, their attention was drawn to the found of diffress and weeping at a little distance; the voices appeared to be principally those of women; Raa Kook immediately led Mr Sharp from the company to the place whence the noise proceeded. They found a great multitude of women attending a dead corpse, which

which was neatly wrapped in a mat, and supported by four men; they kept up a constant lamentation, and were justabout to lay it down, when the strangers joined them. The body was immediately deposited in the grave without any ceremony, while the men who had borne it on their shoulders, proceeded to cover it quickly with the dust. The women then kneeled down, and their cries increased so much, that they appeared as if they were anxious to tear up the very body again, which had been just buried. A heavy shower of rain obliged Mr Sharp to leave this interesting scene, to seek shelter, but he never could learn the cause of Raa Kook's behaviour on this occasion; as notwithstanding the uncommon regard he had for his late fon, whose body they were convinced it, was, he preserved the most profound K 2 filence filence on the subject; nor did he appear particularly interested. The most probable conjecture they could form was, that he considered it to be below that dignity of mind which he on all occasions wished to support, to appear concerned on an occasion which generally produces those feelings that betray what they consider as human weakness.

The night proved very stormy, so they could not return to Pelew, but spent the evening with Raa Kook. In the morning Raa Kook carried Mr Sharp and the boatswain, to a little hut contiguous to the place where his son had been buried. Here they sound only an old woman, to whom the General spoke for some time; she then went out, but returned in a little, bringing with her two old cocoa-nuts, some red ochre, and a bundle of beetle-nut with with the leaves. He took the cocoanuts and croffed them with the ochre, placing them one on each fide by him; after which he repeated fomething to himfelf, which they supposed to be a prayer; he then croffed the beetle-nut in the same manner, and sat musing over it a little, when he gave them to the woman, who carried them out, as Mr Sharp supposed, to the grave; he wished to follow her, but as Raa Kook appeared under great agitation and not inclined to rife, he did not leave him, nor enquire farther.

Mr Sharp entertained his friends with the inspection of his watch and surgical instruments, with which they were greatly pleased, as well as with the description he gave them of the mode of amputation, &c.

Their countrymen they had left at Pelew were in great distress about their

absence; they had been witnesses to the funeral of another young man who had been slain in the same battle. As they were accidentally straggling thro' the fields about two miles from Pelew, they observed a great number of the natives going towards a village, with Abba Thulle at their head. They came to a large pavement, where the King was feated, and a great crowd furrounded him. Those who bare the corpse, moved flowly on before the King, who addressed them in a speech, probably recapitulating the qualifications of the deceased. This Eulogium he delivered with great folemnity, and the respectful filence of all around him, added a degree of affecting grandeur to the scene. The body was then carried to the grave, attended by women only, and thither Mr Matthias Wilson followed. He observed an aged woman getting getting out of the new made grave, whom he supposed to be the mother or fome near relation of the deceased, who had been examining if every thing was properly prepared to her mind. The last offices they always commit to the women, as the men who are nearly interested or, relations, might be led to discover some exterior marks of grief, which they confider as derogatory to the dignity of manhood. Immediately on the body being laid in the grave, the women fet up loud lamentations, as in the case of Raa Kook's fon, and Mr Wilson left them.

Their graves are made in the same manner as in this country; some have a flat stone laid horizontally on the the grave, to prevent any person from trampling upon it. They have also particular spots of ground set apart for the purpose of burying their dead.

Disaster of the Vessel—Account of the Third Engagement—Captain Wilson's Visit to Rupacks—Abba Thulle Visits the English with his Wife and Daughter, &c.

THE Veffel was now confiderably advanced, when an unlucky accident had nearly baulked their high raised expectations. One night the tide rose to a very uncommon height, and had nearly waihed away the blocks from under her. At this time they were very short of hands; besides those at Pelew, three were very fick, fo that the repairing the accident, and raising a strong bank to defend from any fimilar tide, took up feveral days. The weather was at this time very stormy and difagreeable, in so much, that some days they could not leave the tents to work.

The

The jolly boat was dispatched to Pelew for provisions, and in three days returned, with the agreeable news that the English were safe returned to Pelew from the expedition to Artingall, which had been very fuccessful; but Abba Thulle would not yet part with them, as he was anxious to shew them his gratitude, by entertaining them in the best manner he could, They now alfo brought with them, the ship's coppers, that some of the natives had carried off, on their first wisht to the wreck; this coming to Raa Kook's knowledge he had ordered them to be returned, as he would by no means suffer any thing to be kept, that belonged to the English,

On Tuesday the 7th of October all the warriors returned, in high spirits with the entertainment they had met with at Pelew. They were attended by Raa Kook, who brought with him two jars of molosses and some excellent yams. They gave the following account of the third engagement.

"The canoes were affembled and proceeded on the expedition in the fame manner as formerly, but were much more numerous. On their arrival at Artingall, the fame notice of the attack was fent, but no canoes were to be feen, nor any appearance of opposition. Raa Kook therefore took the command, and having landed the troops, led them up into the country; while Abba Thulle continued in his canoe, and dispatched his orders to the two commanders Raa Kook and Arra Kooker. They foon met the inhabitants, who defended themselves with the greatest resolution and bravery; the King entreated the English not to land, lest any of them should meet with harm; but they, obferving ferving their friends rather hotly handled, jumped on shore, attacked the e-r nemy, and furrounded a house to which severals of them had retreated. The musquets soon put them to slight, and fet the house in flames; upon this one of the Pelew people, regardless of the danger, ran in among the flames, and fnatching a burning faggot, carried it to another house, where many of the enemy had taken shelter, set it on fire, and returned fafe to his compani-Abba Thulle publickly acknowledged his valour, by putting a firing of beads in his ear, and afterwards creating him an inferior Rupack. The English were frequently in considerable danger from the spears of the enemy, which they showered upon them in great numbers; but they were foon dispersed by a round of musquets, by which many of them loft their . .

their lives. Arra Kooker and Thomas Wilfon made a very narrow escape; Arra had ascended the hill in pursuit of the enemy by much too far, when noticing one of the Artingall people coming down, he skulked among some bushes, till he was past; then running after him, fetched him fuch a blow with a wooden fword as immediately stunned him; but as he was dragging him prisoner to a canoe, Wilson luckily observed three or four of the enemy in pursuit of him; who would in all probability have killed him in a few minutes; he therefore immediately levelled his musquet at them, which they perceiving, instantly turned about and fled; this was a very fortunate circumstance, as although Wilson had presented his musquet, he could do no execution with it, his ammunition having been previously expended.

Five

Five canoes were burnt in this engagement, and the causeway or landing place demolished. The only trophy of victory, the conquerors carried with them, was the large stone on which the king sat in council; a circumstance which naturally reminds a Briton, of the coronation stone, which Edward I. carried to London from Scone. Great rejoicings took place on their return to Pelew; though the untimely end of Raa Kook's fon, with another blooming youth, who loft his life in the engagement, ferved to throw a damp on many."

About this time Mr Barker had a very fevere fall, which confined him some days; but notwithstanding of the delays occasioned by sickness and accidents, the schooner advanced pretty quickly, so that by the middle of

October

October her beams were all laid, and many of them secured.

Matters being in an agreeable train at Oroolong, Captain Wilson now refolved to pay a visit with Abba Thulle, to some of the neighbouring islands, his allies; he was attended by his fon Henry Wilson, Tom Rose and Thomas Dutton. They left Oroolong in the morning of the 8th of October, along with their good friend Raa Kook; they reached Pelew by ten at night, where they were kindly received by Abba Thulle's eldest son Qui BILL; the King having set off only a little before for an island called Emungs: Raa Kook proposed to Captain Wilson to follow him immediately, but as he found himself a good deal indisposed, he rather wished to spend the night at Pelew. They embarked next morning having in their party, two wives wives of Raa Kook's and Qui Bill. They steered about twelve leagues to the northward, and about noon were off the mouth of a rivulet which runs up into the island of Emungs. Raa Kook then founded conch shells to notify their arrival. This rivulet they found very difficult to navigate, being both shallow and narrow, besides a number of sharp coral stones on the fides; fo that the boatmen had frequently to get out and haul them up. They advanced upwards of a mile before they faw any houses or inhabitants, when upon the conch-shell being again founded, four young men appeared, who foon retired precipitately as if terrified; in a little time however, a great number of the natives came to the water fide, when Captain Wilson and Raa Kook landed; and were conducted to a large house, where great multitudes furrounded them, gazing with much astonishment, on the strangers, whose colour and dress were fo new to them; besides, their curiosity had been raised by the accounts of their valiant deéds in battle, of which they had heard. They remained here about half an hour, and then fet forward to a large house or public building, about a quarter of a mile distant, where Abba Thulle, and a number of Rupacks were waiting their arrival. After spending about two hours there, they went to visit the Rupack of the town, an old infirm man; here they remained about half an hour, and had some boiled yams, fish, and sweet drink fet before them; they are a little and returned to the great house, where a great entertainment was waiting them. The company were divided into two parties; in the one were Abba Thulle, Captain

Captain Wilson and his attendants, and in the other Raa Kook, Qui Bill and others. Captain Wilson here remarked, that nobody ventured to taste the meat, till the King had given the word, and in like manner none ventured to lie down for sleep, till he was covered with his mat.

After eating, the natives began a dance in their usual manner, which continued the whole night; they sung also a good deal, and as both men and women joined, they produced together a terrible noise. The English spent but a very uncomfortable night here; they had only rough uneven boards to lie on; and had they been more agreeably laid, the noise of the singing made it impossible to get any rest. These amusements continued part of next day; and in the afternoon, they were entertained with a mock fight betwist two of the natives, and a dance with spears in their hands, which continued about an hour; during this dance, the chief presented Captain Wilson with four different spears, and a curious wooden fword, inlaid with shell. Next day they had new dances, which however, were foon stopped by a terrible storm of thunder and lightning. The weather clearing up in the afternoon, the old Rupack was brought out to the large pavement, carried on a board flung with ropes on two poles, which were supported by four men. A piece of etiquette now took place, which the English did not understand; all the Rupacks feated themselves with much refpect on the pavement, where the old Rupack fat, but Abba Thulle went to a little distance, and sat at the foot of a tree making the handle of a hatchet; his place was fupplied among the Rupacks, by Raa

Raa Kook who perfonated and spoke for him. Having conversed together for fome time, the old Rupack distributed presents of beads among the rest. These beads are in general a kind of coloured earth, which they bake by a particular process which the English could not get an opportunity of seeing; some of the Pelew people however had made a parcel out of some bottles they had got from the Antelope, having turned them very neatly. The method of distributing these beads was as follows: the old Rupack gave forme of them to one of his attendants, who went into the middle of the fquare, then mentioned the person for whom they were designed, pronounced an eulogium upon him, and running up to him, delivered them to him. After the Rupacks had got their share, Tom Rose was sent for Captain Willon, who was in the house observing observing the ceremony from a window; to him the old Rupack gave a string of red beads, and two tortoise-shell spoons. After this ceremony, they spent another hour in conversation together, when the old Rupack was carried back again on his board, and refreshments set before the Rupacks.

Captain Willon took an opportunity of enquiring the reason of a number of human skulls being placed upon the outfide of the doors, windows and ends of the great house, and was informed, that not many months before, while the principal people of Emungs were absent on a visit to a neighbouring island, the inhabitants of Artingall landed and at acked the town, putting to death fuch as could not make their escape; setting the houses on fire and destroying wherever they came; notice of this having reached Pelew, Abba Thulle.

Thulle quickly affembled his canoes, and befet them unexpectedly; at the same time, the people of Emungs returning from their visit, they so completely surrounded the Artingall people, that very few of them escaped; and those were the heads of some of the chiefs.

Captain Wilson having signified a wish to depart, next morning the couchshell was sounded, and the canoes asfembled by day-break. About eight o'clock they embarked in company with one Maath, a Rupack of confequence in a northern island, who had eight or nine canoes in his retinue; they parted with him at the mouth of the rivulet. He carried with him the fcarlet coat and spaniel dog which Captain Wilson had given Abba Thulle, in order to shew them to his countrymen, but they were afterwards returned to Pelew.

Pelew. Before his departure, he anxioully entreated Captain Wilson and his company to go with him, which they declined, as it would have detained them too long from Oroolong. They continued their route homewards very agreeably, till about ten o'clock, when a very violent storm of thunder and lightning, accompanied with a deluge of rain overtook them. The high wind foon dispersed the canoes, and the boatmen of that in which Captain Wilson was, having in vain endeavoured tofteer on their way, agreed to make for the fhore, which was done; and then kindled a fire by rubbing two flicks together. Raa Kook covered himfelf with his mat, and his two wives sheltered themselves under his boat cloak, at every flash of lightning, ejaculating what the English supposed to be a pray-Captain Wilson observed on this and

and other occasions, that the natives of these islands had a peculiar dislike to their skins being wetted by rain, probably the spattering of a shower was disagreeable, for it could not proceed from any aversion to water, as they bathed every day. The weather cleared up about noon, when the companies of the different canoes met together and dined. They then walked up the country to a town named Aramalorgoo, where they were kindly entertained. Before they embarked, Raa Kook expressed a desire to fire a musquet, which he had never done, and Captain Wilson humoured him; but holding it loofely, it struck his shoulder fo forcibly, that it fell from his hands and he tumbled backwards. It astonished him to see the English fire it so easily, while he could neither hold it nor stand when fired.

They

They touched at a place called Emelligree, which appeared to be a distinct government. The Rupack, a lufty, good-looking old man, fent them a formal invitation to visit him, which they did. Abba Thulle defired that all his company should attend this Rupack, but he himself kept by his canoe, probably from the fame etiquette which regulated his conduct at Emungs. At this place they were treated with all hospitality, not only in public, but at several private houses; and were detained so long that the inhabitants had to conduct them to their canoes with torches, for it was very dark.

It was ten o'clock before the canoe in which Captain Wilson and his party were, arrived at Pelew; and as the King was not yet come, none of the natives would land; the English tho' under no restraint, chose to shew their politeness politeness on this occasion, by waiting for him also. He soon arrived and spent this night with the English in the house by the water side. Next morning at breakfast, Abba Thulle informed Captain Wilson that he was directed by a Council, to request the assistance of his men in battle, yet once more. The Captain replied, that nothing could give him greater satisfaction than to be of any service to the Pelew people that lay in his power, but when he left Oroolong, fo many of the men lay fick, that till he faw how they were, and conversed with his officers, he could not give a positive answer; with this they appeared very well fatisfied, and about eleven o'clock in the forenoon, Captain Wilson and his party, with Raa Kook, fet fail for Oroolong, where they arrived safe, about four o'clock.

Among the first employments after Captain Wilson's return was Difcipline. During his absence, the Cook had misbehaved exceedingly, appropriating great part of the small portion of the meat they were allowed, to himfelf and his afliftant. As it was necesfary, in their present situation, that the strictest discipline should be exercised, Captain Wilson, by a Court Martial, ordered him a cobbing. The native tenderness of Raa Kook's disposition appeared eminently on this occasion; when he faw the man stripped to the waist and his hands tied against a tree to keep him extended, he entreated Captain Wilson to let him off. The punishment of cobbing is inflicted by a thin flat piece of wood like a battledore; which Raa no sooner saw exercised, and the man bearing it patiently, than he was reconciled standing by by and encouraging him all the time. A Chinese was also punished in the same manner, for wounding one of his countrymen with a stone; but he roared and bellowed so lustily, that Raa Kook was greatly entertained with his cowardice.

The canoes now frequently touched at Oroolong with fish, so that the English had in general plenty of fresh provisions. On the 15th of October, three canoes landed, in one of which was a woman, the first they had yet seen at the cove. She went through the different works and furveyed every thing with great attention, but with great caution. The men that accompanied her did not land, nor could Captain Wilson conceive from whence they came; it was conjectured they were from Emilligree, as none of the English could recollect any of their countenances.

Abba

Abba Thulle arrived about ten o'clock on the 17th, with the agreeable news, that the Chief Minister of Artingall had been at Pelew with offers of peace, which had been concluded upon, to the great joy of Raa Kook and the other natives. Abba Thulle brought his youngest daughter with him, named Erre Bess, of whom he appeared to be exceedingly fond; he conducted her through all the cove and explained the use of every thing with much attention. Besides her he also brought with him on this visit Ludee, one of his wives; a very beautiful woman, young, and greatly superior to any of the females they had hitherto feen; her genteel deportment and graceful step drew the attention of every beholder. She had with her eight or ten females, who were all efcorted by Raa Kook, and shewn the forge, vessel, guns, tents and other other curiofities, with which they were greatly furprifed. The King had also brought some of his artificers with him (or Tacklebys, as he called them) to obferve the progress of the vessel, &c. he feemed peculiarly anxious that they should pay attention to the schooner, which all ranks agreed in confidering as the ne plus ultra of human workmanship. After their curiofity had been fully fatisfied, the Captain prepared an entertainment for them in the tent, confifting principally of fish, and boiled rice, sweetened with molosses, of which they appeared very fond.

A good deal of conversation took place on this visit between the King and Captain Wilson on various subjects. Abba Thulle acknowledged that the English musquets had now procured him peace with almost all his neighbours; he at same time requested that the Captain would leave ten musquets with him when he left the island; this Captain Wilson told him would not be in his power, as Britain was at present engaged in war with several different nations, with whose veffels they might fall in on their return homeward, and so require defensive weapons; but he promised him five, which greatly pleased him. Abba Thulle then enquired what quantity of powder they had, but observing that Captain Wilson was not disposed to answer. him readily, he very politely changed the subject. The Captain then desired he would affure his neighbouring islanders, that the English, deeply sensible of the kind usage they had received from the inhabitants of Pelew, were determined to return very foon, in a much larger ship, and with a greater number of men, and fully avenge any infult that that might be offered to the Pelewites, either by the people of Artingall, or any other island.

Agreeable to a former promise of Captain Wilson's, Abba Thulle then informed him, he had come at this time to get the guns from the wreck, which should either be placed at Oroolong or Pelew, as the English pleased; Captain Wilson having previously consulted his officers, defired him to take them all to Pelew, except one, which they might perhaps need in the schooner. Accordingly, next day, the King ordered fome of his people to go to the wreck in order to remove them. Having no tackle, they found it a very difficult jobb, and were forced to fend for ten of our people to affift them; the Englishmen speedily lodged them in the canoes to the surprise of the natives, who could not conceive it possible to handle these these heavy pieces with such apparent, ease.

The King lodged at the back of the island, carrying with him all his attendants, that the English might be as little interrupted by them as possible. He had not been long there, when he fent for Captain Wilson to give him ten large fish, part of a quantity his people had taken; of these he would only. receive four, which would fully supper all his people, and fuch is the nature of the climate there, that no fish will keep fresh above five or fix hours. King then ordered the remaining fix to be dreffed for keeping, and fent to the cove in the morning. Their method of cleaning and dreffing them is as follows; the fish is first well cleaned, washed, and all the scales taken off; then two slicks are placed lengthways of the fish, in order to keep it straight, in the same manner as sticks are placed across salmon in this country when kippering; it is then bound round with broad plantain leaves, and smoked over a slow sire. In this state it will be eatable for at least two days, though not very pleasant.

In the morning, the ears of the English were faluted with the noise of singing in the woods, which proved to be Raa Kook and his attendants coming across the country, with the six dried fish, which were very acceptable. This morning the King went to the wreck, and returned to the cove, and breakfasted on tea with Captain Wilfon, three Artingall people being also of the party. After breakfast, the strangers were led through the works, and their surprise was nothing inferior to any that had yet been expressed; the guns particularly interested them, as the the means by which fo many of their countrymen died, in a manner then incomprehensible. In a few days they had a farther opportunity of feeing the effects of the musquets, by Mr Benger's killing some pigeons while on wing, they run to the carcases, and examined them very attentively, and upon noticing the wounds, observed, it was with fuch holes as these their countrymen died; on this occasion the Pelewites feemed to exult a little over their neighbours, on the ignorance which they shewed of the use of fire arms. The People of Artingall however retained no animofity on this account but seemed quite happy and at ease.

Captain Wilson had now occasion to complain to Abba Thulle of a theft which had been committed by some of his people, a cooper's adze and a caulking iron being amissing; the latter he recovered recovered immediately, but the adze he found had been carried to Pelew.

On Monday the 20th the King went again to the wreck, and in his absence a message was sent by Raa Kook to Captain Wilson, informing him that he was very bad, and wished much to fee the Captain and Mr Sharp. They went immediately to fee their good friend, whom they found much diftreffed with a large boil on his arm, which was attended with a confiderable degree of fever. Mr Sharp dreffed it with care, and found him much better on his return in the evening, when the King was prefent, and expressed great thankfullness for the attention paid to his brother; Abba Thulle appeared very much interested for his recovery, and on every occasion manifested the highest concern about all his relations and friends. Captain Wilson observed when there in the forenoon, that Raa Kook was attended by his wives, who appeared greatly agitated; their breafts were fcratched and bleeding, by means of a prickly leaf, which they applied very smartly, in order to testify their concern.

During Abba Thulle's residence on Oroolong, the English were regularly supplied with fresh and dried sish, which were very acceptable; among the rest were some Kima Cockles, so famous throughout Europe for their beautiful shells. Another unknown animal was observed about this time, fomewhat fimilar to our batt, but four times its fize; it runs along the ground, climbs trees and leaps from branch to branch with great alertness; besides which, it has wide extended wings, and flies rapidly. It is esteemed a nice dish at Pelew, and like the pigeon, pigeon, facred for chiefs only. On the 21st Abba Thulle came round to the cove on his way to Pelew. He asked Captain Wilson if the English would assist him in battle once more, to which Captain Wilson readily agreed. He then told him that there would be a grand council held at Pelew on the fubject the next day, the refult of which he would communicate; on this account Raa Kook would not remain behind, though far from well, his prefence being necessary in council. The King then informed the Captain, that he would fend him a quantity of paint for their vessel, and desired the jolly boat might be fent for it; this was done, and a quantity fent, much more than sufficient for their purpose. confifted of red and yellow ochre, being all the natural paints of the country; the King sent a strict charge to pre-N ferve ferve the baskets, in which the colours were packed, from wet; and informed, that men would be fent proper for painting the vessel, on their return from the proposed expedition. Mr Devis, Tom Rose, and another of the English people went with the King to Pelew, and remained there till the 24th, in which time Abba Thulle had made still farther enquiries at them as to some particulars concerning which he wished to be informed, particularly as to the nations with whom Captain Wilson had mentioned the English were at war.

By the 26th of October the vessel was breamed and the outside caulking completed. The same day, a number of strangers touched at the cove, in ten canoes; they proved to be friends to Abba Thulle, on their way to join his fleet. It appeared they had previously oully heard of the English, and by that means were not fo much surprised on feeing them; yet they were greatly entertained with the various works, through which they were conducted. Their chief was an elderly man, and fpent the greater part of the time they were on shore in Captain Wilson's tent; finding a book on his table, he was much pleased with the appearance of it, and entertained himself by reckoning the number of leaves in it, a task which he could not accomplish, having frequently proceeded the length of fifty, but could not go further.

Mr Sharp now paid a visit to Raa Kook, to enquire after his health, and was happy to find him much better. One of the surgeons at Pelew had cut the core of the boil, and the surrounding slesh with one of their knives. When we consider the nature of the instrument with which all their furgical operations are performed, and that all. their knowledge consists in cutting out the part affected, one cannot avoid feeling for the pain, or rather torture, which those must endure, who are so unhappy as to need their affistance. Perhaps they may now be enabled to execute their operations with fomewhat less pain, as the English distributed a few twopenny knives among them. Mr Sharp re-dreffed Raa Kook's fore, and left feveral dreffings, with proper directions for application. His visit to the General was considered as very flattering, and warmly recommended him not to the friends of his patient only, but to all the island, who were particularly fond of Raa Kook.

In the afternoon of Monday, the 27th of October, Abba Thulle, arrived at Oroolong, with a great number of canoes in his train; they formed the third grand division of the fleet, which altogether confisted of upwards of 300 canoes. They failed in good order and made a very formidable appearance. The following ten men prepared to go on this expedition; Mr Matthias Wilson, Thomas Wilson, William Roberts, Thomas Dutton, Nicholas Tyacke, Madan Blanchard, Thomas Whitfield, John Duncan, Jas. Swift and William Steward. Immediately on the King landing he was informed the men were ready; upon which they all embarked, the English on shore giving them three cheers, which they in concert with the natives returned very warmly.

Expedition to Pelelew-Visit from Abba Thulle-Launching of the Schooner-Presents to the King-Preparations for Departure-Captain Wilson made a Rupack-Blanchard's Determination to Remain-Proposal for Lee Boo returning with the Englishother Proceedings previous to Sailing.

THE Armament were scarcely out of fight, when a very furious storm arose at Oroolong, which distressed them all exceedingly; not only on account of the danger their vessel and tents were in, but the apprehensions they reasonably entertained for the safety of their absent friends. They were however foon relieved; on Thursday the 30th October about midnight, their companions having been only gone about three days, a canoe was observed coming towards the harbour, and the crew calling out Englees, they were permitted mitted to land. In this cance, came Arra Kook, and the furgeon's fucalic, or friend, the news of whose arrival soon raised the English from their beds to hear some account of their friends. The original cause of the contest with the natives of Pelelew it seems had been, their refusing to deliver up two people that had been faved from the Malay wreck; immediately therefore, on Abba Thulle's appearing on their coast, the enemy laid down their weapons, offered presents, and delivered up the two Malay-men. Next day, these agreeable tidings were confirmed by the return of the party, who gave the following account of the expedition.

"They met with very bad weather the first night, and were obliged to land on an uninhabited island, about four leagues distant from Pelelew, where they erected temporary huts. Next day two different different parties went on an excursion to a neighbouring island, where they terrified the natives, and pillaged a little. Abba Thulle then called a council, in consequence of which Arra Kooker fet off next morning to Pelelew, and concluded the peace. return in the afternoon, the English were informed, that in the present situation of affairs it would be derogatory to his dignity to approach Pelelew, but if they had any wish to see the island, Arra Kooker would attend them. This offer was accepted, having previoully entered into a bargain, to keep close together, in case of treachery on the part of the Pelelewans. They were attended by a great number of the Pelew people, and highly entertained with the island. They found the country pleafant and fertile; the land appeared nearly level, and the houses were large and and better constructed than those at Pelew: The natives seemed to be friendly and humane, and they shewed a very marked respect to our countrymen, although the object of their visit had been to spread devastation. Indeed the natives of Pelew discovered a degree of rancour against these Pelelewans rather inconsistent either with their character or practice; the English were ready to think they had been stimulated to it by the Malay, in order to get his two friends out among them.

Abba Thulle made a very short stay at Oroolong, as did even Raa Kook; they returned to Pelew accompanied by the King of Pelelew. This Rupack was an elderly man, and of a stern rough appearance; his hair was grey, and his beard tapered to a narrow point. The only other singularity about him, from the people of Pelew was, his being tatooed quite up to the navel, while their tatooing did not exceed the middle of their thighs. Mr Sharp with four of the men set off the day following for Pelew, in order to bring over some molosses promised them by Raa Kook. He mentioned that the usual rejoicings had taken place at Pelew on the happy termination of this expedition; and fongs were composed on the occasion in which these words could be distinguished, " Englees,-Weel a Trecoy" (very good); and in a particular manner Tom Rose was celebrated in them. This agreeable jocose young man, acted as an interpreter on all occasions, and had made himself a favourite among the natives.

About this time Captain Wilson intimated a wish to his officers and crew, that they would agree to a few days being spent in navigating round the shores shores of this cluster of islands, where they had spent so many weeks with a degree of comfort and satisfaction, far surpassing their most sanguine expectations. He told them they were the first Europeans who had hitherto visited them, and as human nature was here to be seen in an attire, she had never assumed, so far as he had heard, it would be acceptable to their Employers, and a service to mankind, to spend some little time in visiting the other islands at which they had not yet touched; he faid that Abba Thulle would chearfully give them all the affistance in his power, and it was a task which could easily be overtaken. But however plausible the scheme, it was approved by none—the fear of being engaged in hostilities with some of those islands to which they were strangers; the danger of encountering sea storms in small canoes; and above all, the protracting the anxiously expected hour when they should again set sail for their native country, determined them all to entreat the Captain to lay aside the scheme; which he accordingly did.

Meanwhile the veffel advanced apace, and a confultation was held, to fix on the fafest method of launching her, which was agreed to be lay ways. They had neither pitch nor rosin to pay her with; this want, necessity, the mother of invention, taught them to supply by burning coral stone into a lime; then sifting it thoroughly, they mixed it up with grease, and sound in it an excellent succedaneum.

THE Reader will not have followed his countrymen thus far, and seen Providence rescuing them from the jaws of death, and fostering them in these to us unknown regions, without feeling his heart warmed in no common degree to the friendly islanders, by whom they were protected; yet it is now necessary to unfold a scene on the part of the English, which without well weighing the accompanying circumstances, he will be ready to cenfure as ungrateful, ungenerous, and cruel. Instances of such noble sentiments of liberality, uncontrouled by art or interest, and continued so long, are so very rare even in civilized nations, that the minds of several of the English were ready to take alarm at the fmallest accident, lest all this overflow of kindness, should only be to lull them in security, till they should in the first place serve their own ends by them, and then more effectually cut them off. A message from the King at this time, informing informing that he proposed paying them a visit in a few days, and remaining with them till their departure, gave the first alarm; but on Tuesday November the 4th, two canoes being observed off the harbour, towards night, and neither of them coming in, it was instantly concluded that they were spies, and that the natives, con scious of the value of their aid in battle, intended to prevent their departure. Every precaution was therefore made for a vigorous defence, in spite of the eloquence of Captain Wilson, who infifted that it was a degree of injustice to entertain even a suspicion of a people so hospitable, and a prince so generous and condescending. He ridiculed the idea of defence, supposing the natives really meant to detain them, as the ammunition was nearly expended, and the natives could so easily cut off off their fresh water. These and many other arguments equally forcible availed nothing; it was determined that every one should be on his guard; that the swivels and fix pounder should be loaded with grape shot, the small arms charged with ball, and the cartouch boxes loaded with cartridges, and lest they might be overpowered with numbers, it was agreed to fingle out the chiefs for the bayonet or musquet, with a view to difinay and difperse the multitude. There is not one circumstance in all this narrative, which is more disagreeable to relate, than what common fidelity requires to be now mentioned; that the amiable and princely Abba Thulle, the humane, benevolent Raa Kook, and the jocofe, entertaining and warm hearted Arra Kooker, were to have been the first victims of this phrenzy; not that the English English were deadened to every sense of honour, gratitude, and generofity; but when the precious cup of liberty was now almost at their lips, the dread of its being yet wrenched from them, however groundless the idea, wrought fo powerfully as to absorbe, for a moment, every principle of honour. Happy are we to fay, it was but for a little time, that these ungenerous sentiments prevailed: the reflection of a night greatly moderated them, and by morning light, there were none of the company who did not feel, in some degree, the force of what Captain Wilson had alledged the preceding night; yea many among them blushed at the appearance they had made to one another, discovering the weakness of human nature, when struggling between the hopes of returning to their native country.

country, and the dread of perpetual detention.

Agreeable to a previous promise he had made to the King, Captain Wilfon dispatched the jolly boat to Pelew, on the morning of the 6th of November, under the direction of Mr Sharp and Mr Matthias Wilson, who carried along with them, all the iron and tools they could spare. They were defired to inform Abba Thulle, that until the vessel was completely finished, they could not spare him the musquets, nor any more tools, but in the mean time, they hoped to have the pleasure of a vifit from him, as they expected to be ready to fail in a few days; they were also defired to express in the warmest manner, the high sense the English entertained of the unbounded kindness they had received, which they were determined publicly to declare on their return to Britain. While Captain Wilfon was talking with his ambassadors about this message, Madan Blanchard entered the apartment in quest of some tools he wanted; and immediately took the opportunity of desiring Tom Rose, who was to be of the party, to inform the King that he was determined to stay behind and reside at Pelew; upon the Captain ridiculing his message, he folemnly declared that he would not embark with them. Many attempts were made to convince him of the impropriety of fuch a step, but all in vain; mean time, the Captain ordered that this circumstance should not be mentioned at present, and the boat departed. By Captain Wilson's desire, Blanchard's companions used every argument in their power to divert him from a scheme so very imprudent in every point of view; but he informed them his his mind was resolved. The idea of deferting his comrades suggested itself on his return from the first expedition against Artingall, and he then mentioned it; at the same time adding, that he would cheerfully join in their daily labours, with the same diligence and perseverance as any of them; but that he had resolved to end his days at Pelew, without again encountering the conflicting elements at sea. Having formed no particular connection with any females, they looked upon him as in jest, but he never altered his resolution.

Next day the boat returned from Pelew, having in company, the King, his young favourite daughter, Raa Kook and several chiefs of distinction; they had been impeded by a storm; and as was formerly noticed, though these people go perfectly naked, and frequently quently bathe, they fly to shelter from a storm of rain, with the eagerness of an English Beau, to preserve a new or fashionable coat. The Englishmen in the pinnace fell in with the Pelew company in their canoes during the storm, and accompanied them to the island of Pethoull, where they spent the night together. The ladies who were of the party, expressed not a little disappointment in being obliged to halt a night by the way, as they were very impatient to see the launch at Oroolong. They supped together very cheerfully, when there was again opportunity of remarking, that no one prefumed to eat till the monarch had pronounced the word Munga, that is Eat, upon which a fignal is given to the attendants without, when all begin to eat together. Each one's share was portioned out on a plantain leaf, which served ferved for a plate; though on great occasions they use a fort of dish made of tortoise-shell, and others of earthenware and wood; they cut their meat with a knife made of split bamboo, with which they carve very decently.

Mess. Sharp and Wilson now prefented the King with the iron tools, which were very graciously received, they explained the method of using them, to which Raa Kook paid particular attention; the Malay took this opportunity of hinting, that the English had not fent the musquets they had promised; to this Raa Kook with great indignation in his countenance, replied, that they had fent all they had promised to send, previous to their departure, of which they had given due notice; that this infinuation, was like the former, whereby he had nearly effected a difference between them: the difcredit discredit which this behaviour brought upon the Malay, not with Raa Kook only, but all the chiefs, quite disconcerted him, and he retired in confusion.

The order in which the company fat during this night's entertainment, is worthy notice. The house in which they were was in one large apartment, torches were lighted, and stuck in betwixt the boards of the floor, in a line through the centre of the room; and the company sat in rows with their backs to the light.

When ready to retire for rest, the servants brought in the mats, and sires being lighted to defend from the musquitoes, the torches were extinguished, and all was silence. This however was interrupted about two or three in the morning by the arrival of a messenger, who was introduced to the King. This they they afterwards learned was a message from some of the neighbouring islands enquiring the time of the departure of the English. The method which Abba Thulle used to send his answer, is very noticeable, he took a string, and put as many knots upon it as there were days to the time. This enquiry at first sounded rather disagreeable to the English, but it afterwards proved to be a fresh instance of their kindness, as they only wished to know, for the purpose of contributing to their sea store.

Next morning proved calm, and they set sail; the King and daughter, Raa Kook and another chief, went with the English in the pinnace; a sudden squall arising nearly overset most of the canoes, but the pinnace, sailed very easily to the great satisfaction of Abba Thulle, who was mightily pleased to hear that Captain Wilson proposed leaving her with him.

Immediately on his arrival, Abba Thulle ordered his men to proceed in painting the vessel, which they did. Raa Kook assisted himself in the operation, under the immediate direction of the King. The stern was the place which he decorated with all his art; in particular he was at pains with two circles, some ornaments, hanging from them, the particular intention of which the English never discovered. In the afternoon, the ship was lowered off the blocks upon the ways; but being too much over to one fide, was fwept with a rope, and to bouse her over, a tackle got upon it. The King attentive to their proceedings fetched a long pole, to apply as a lever to heave the veffel over; but, on a hint being given that it was wrong, he defifted; she was easily got upon the ways, and every thing being ready, the next morning was appointed for the important launch. The King now fat down near the scene of bustle; and after a short conversation with his brother and the chiefs, ordered it to be fignified to Captain Wilson, that it was his request he would change the name of the ship to that of the O roolong, in remembrance of the island, and the people. A ready concurrence being universally given, the good prince appeared more than commonly happy. The Captain being told that Blanchard was coming to offer himself to the Pelew King, determined to make a merit of necessity, and therefore signified to Abba Thulle, that as a return for the hospitality with which the English had been treated, they would leave one of their comrades with him, as a perpetual residenter, who was qualified to manage nage the great guns and other things, beyond their comprehension. The idea was by no means thrown away; the King was gratified beyond measure.

This night Blanchard spent with the King, and was well entertained. He promised to make him a Rupack, to give him a house and plantations, and allow him two wives. All the crew regretted much to part with Blanchard; his agreeable behaviour made him beloved by his companions, who lost no opportunity to speak in his behalf to the natives. This resolution of his, howeyer, was inexplicable; as it is difficult to conjecture what motives could urge him to forfake that class of mankind among whom he had hitherto lived, and be separated from them perhaps for ever. As Abba Thulle, Raa Kook and the natives in general, considered his remaining among them as a very great compliment, compliment, they were resolved to make him happy; and there is great probability, he now lives among them in a situation not only comfortable but respectable. Meantime the reader probably looks forward with anxiety to the return of these ships, which it is expected have ere this, paid a visit to these islands, in hopes of hearing somewhat concerning the future fortunes of this young man. He was only about twenty years of age when left there.

Abba Thulle defired Captain Wilson and his officers to point out to him a proper spot about the cove, where he meant to plant some cocoa-nuts and yams, for the refreshment of the English on their next visit. This was done accordingly, and it was observed, that upon the grain being put in the ground, the person planting muttered a few words to himself. An attempt was also made to launch the vessel this afternoon but in vain.

We come now to contemplate a scene peculiarly interesting. Next morning (Sunday the 9th of October) the English proceeded before day-break to make ready for the launch; it need scarcely be mentioned, that uncommon pains were taken to put every thing in the most favourable train for getting herafloat. About seven the King and attendants were defired to be pr. sent, and in a little time the veffel was agreeably launched, to the general joy of every spectator. Never was there a more affectingly happy scene.—Every eye feemed to sparkle with a lustre borrowed for the occasion.—Every countenance looked animating joy and heartfelt satisfaction; but few among them could utter their feelings: looks of congratulation circulated around, while every every one shook his neighbour's hand with warmest fervour. Home, wives, parents, children, friends-all-allfeemed as within grasp-but description is unequal to this task. Let not however the behaviour of their Pelexy friends be forgotten; in their joy which was also unbounded, real philanthropy was to be feen-They saw by this occurrence, those friends whom they valued about to leave them; those friends by whom they had been so much benefited, and from whom they had learned fo much—but they faw them happy -they knew their whole comfort depended upon the success of this event, and therefore their benevolent hearts -participated in the general joy.

After a very happy breakfast indeed, they proceeded to carry every thing aboard with all possible expedition, and in the afternoon, the flood tide coming in, the ship was hauled into the bason, a deep place of four or five fathom water; and in the course of the day, they got on board all the provisions, stores, &c. such only excepted as were to be given in presents to the King; and in the morning took on board their anchors, cables, and other necessaries, making bitts, and fitting a rail across the stern of the vessel.

Abba Thulle being now at the watering-place, fent for Captain Wilson to attend him; on whose arrival it was intimated to him, that the Rupacks had determined to invest him with the order of the Bone, and to create him a Rupack of the first rank; an honour which Captain Wilson said, he considered in a very flattering point of view, and would receive with much joy. We shall mention this ceremony of investing with the Bone with some minuteness, minuteness, as it is a distinction never obtained without the most unequivocal pretenfions to merit, in the field, in the council, or in domestic life; and is esteemed a supreme felicity by the diftinguished candidate. Some may be ready to finile, and ridicule the fimplicity with which these children of nature, stamp this simple ceremony with fo much consequence; but it were happy for European nations, if their marks of honour were as carefully conferred, and as furely indicated true merit in the possessor. The glaring ceremony with which the order of the Star and Garter or the dignity of a Peerage is conferred in Britain, does not convey more honourable fentiments of the distinguished object to the beholders, than this simple unadorned badge of honour does at Pelew; nay there, perhaps it may be justly said, the prospect of the BONE, Bone, excites more emulation, inspires greater courage, and more frequently promotes virtue and commands respect, than the embroidered star or tinselled ribbon do in Britain.

The King and Rupacks having retired to the shade of some trees, they enquired at Captain Wilson of which arm he made most general use, which having found to be the right, they took a circular bone, prepared for the purpose, through which, with a good deal of trouble they compressed his hand; after it had been fairly passed over the joints of the hand, and fixed on the wrist, the King addressed him nearly as follows. "You are now invested with our highest mark of honour, and this Bone, the signal of it, you will carefully keep as bright as possible, rubbing it every day; this high mark of dignity must always be valiantly defended, nor suffered to be wrested from from you but with your life," He was then complimented by his brother chiefs, on being admitted into their order; and the inferior natives, flocking round, shouted aloud to the Engless Rupack.

Monday the 10th, the old dwellings at the cove were cleared, and all the The necessaries carried on board. wondering natives so thronged the vefsel, that they were obliged to complain to Raa Kook, who got orders from the King, that none but Rupacks, should go on board; but that the multitude might observe her, at some little distance in their canoes. As foon as the fails were bent, they took her to the west fide of the island, and moored her in fix fathom water. An immense concourse of natives followed in their canoes, hallooing and shooting in a most joyous manner. The King's two brothers accompanied companied them, who repeatedly called to their people to be minute in observing the management of the ship; as if, at some period, they expected to have one of their own. After this the Captain went on shore to the King, who was waiting for him at Oroolong. Abba Thulle now resumed the subject of fending two of his people to England: he told the Captain, by means of the interpreter, that he had the happiness of being much respected by all his subjects, not only as being superior in rank, but in mental capacity; but notwithstanding, he had often felt his own infignificance, in feeing the meanest Englishman, exercise talents of which he had no conception; and had therefore resolved to part with his youngest son, Lee Boo, who should, in company with one of the Malays, as an attendant, be entrusted to Captain Wilfon's

Wilson's care, that he might be instructed in fuch sciences as would tend, on his return, to advance the prosperity: of the people, and reflect honour on the royal family. This youth, he faid, was of a mild, pliable temper, and an enemy to every kind of vice; he was under the care of an old man who lived at some distance; but had orders: to be at Oroolong in the morning. Captain Wilson replied, that this mark of his regard and esteem affected him deeply, and he should ever think of his confidence with pride; he affured Abba Thulle, that any person belonging to Pelew would meet with attention from him, but the fon of the man to whom he had been fo much indebted, he held himself engaged by every tie, to treat with the same tenderness as his own fon.

Nor

Nor were these the only persons who wished to accompany the English; for fome time an uncommon gloom had obscured Raa Kook's chearful countenance, which seemed to increase as the hour approached when he was to part with his beloved Englees. It was afterwards discovered, that so great was his attachment to the English, that he had asked permission of his brother, the King, to accompany them home; this however could not be granted, as Abba Thulle reminded him, he was next to him in command, and in case of death his fuccessor; that therefore it would be exceedingly imprudent in him to attempt it. A nephew of the King's at same time made application to the same purpose; it was his brother who was slain at Artingall as before-mentioned. This young man urged his fuit to Gaptain Wilson with great importunity, but but the Captain declined till he had obtained permission from his uncle. Captain Wilson conversed Abba Thulle on the subject; he replied, that the young man was unworthy of his protection, having rendered himself disagreeable throughout the island. At the fame time, the young man appearing to plead his own cause, the King sternly addressed him nearly to the following purport. "You are undutiful to your aged mother, and though you have deferving wives, you use them ill. Your vile conduct has been publicly exposed, and now you would fly from the resulting shame! Remain where you are; be albamed of your conduct, and reform."

Abba Thulle now modestly hinted a request to Captain Wilson, that before he set sail, he would sail round in his new vessel to Pelew; he particularly mentioned that many aged people there had never yet seen their vessel, &c. and were very anxious to do so; he said it would not detain them long, and be very agreeable to all his people. The Captain at once conceived that this proposal would be very disagreeable to his men, and perhaps revive their former suspicions, he therefore suggested such objections as satisfied the King that the step would be improper.

The weather and wind appearing favorable, the Captain informed Abba Thulle, that they purposed failing the next day. This very much distressed him; we have formerly mentioned the embassy which had been sent him at Pethoull, in answer to which he had sent word that the day following that now mentioned by the Captain, was the day the English meant to fail, in consequence of which all the neighbouring Rupacks were to come to Orroolong roolong the next night to furnish them with provisions, and bid them farewel. This information determined the Captain still more to set fail in the forenoon, as the number of canoes to be expected, would greatly incommode them, he therefore apologised in the best manner he could to the King, who appeared greatly disappointed. He then begged that the Captain and officers would dine with him and his brothers on shore. With this they cheerfully complied, and after dinner Arra Kooker fo pathetically begged for the favourite dog, of which he had become excessively fond, that they could not refift his folicitations, though it would prove a particular regret among the failors. But the general's intention was far otherwife employed, he was already building a ship in imagination; and to realize his design, wished them to leave their launching Q_2 launching ways, faying he would go to work on the same place. The King had laughed at the infignificance of Arra Kooker's request of the dog; but the subject of ship-building caught his most serious attention; it was of national importance, and of course demanded the patronage of a good prince. In the midst of their discourse a battle on board the ship between two sailors, called for the presence of the Captain: the damage proved no greater than a bloody nose, which being settled, Mr Wilson again returned. When the circumstance was explained to the King, he observed that there were no doubt bad men in all countries. The English permission was asked, and obtained, to hoist an English pendant on a tree near the cove, with an inscription as follows, on copper, to be placed on another tree adjacent:

English East India Company's Ship

Henry Wilson, Commander,
Was lost upon the Reef north of this Island,
In the Night between the 9th and 10th of August;
Who here built a Vessel,

And failed from hence the 12th of November 1783.

Captain Wilson explained the purport of this inscription to Abba Thulle who was greatly pleased with it; and having explained it to his people, he assured the English, that it should carefully stand there in remembrance of their visitors.

The conversation this day was principally confined to the approaching separation. "When you are gone," said the King, "I much dread that the Artingalls will redouble their attempts against me; and deprived of your aid, I shall probably feel the effects of that animosity they have always had towards my people; and having no more the English to support me, I will not be match for them, unless you leave the few musquets you promised me." The Captain was quite satisfied to comply with the request immediately; but most of the officers who still had apprehensions, were unwilling to give up the arms till the last moment; that unlucky fuspicion which had so ungenerously taken possession of them, had been so rivetted in their minds, that it was not eafily diflodged. It is neceffary however, not to condemn our countrymen too hastily; they had been accustomed to see roguery so generally, and fo scientifically practised, that distrust and suspicion are naturally instilled among the first principles of education; and it was not eafy for them to conceive, that the same species should be fo very different even at opposite quarters

quarters of the globe; but here they faw, the open undifguised actions of nature, knowing no deceit and dreading none.

Abba Thulle was too quick fighted not to observe their distrust; and it is not eafy to express the agitation which laboured in his breast, on finding that doubts were harboured of his fincerity. "Why," faid he, "fhould you distrust me? I never refused you my confidence. If my intentions had been hostile, you would have known it long ago, being entirely in my power: but on the contrary, you have had my utmost assistance; and yet at the very last you suspect me of bad designs!" The earnestness of his manner, spoke his feelings more than his words; nor need it be doubted, that a little recollection brought the blush into the countenances of those whom he addressed. The man who had uniformly behaved with fuch difinterested, unsuspecting benevolence—the man who freely committed his own fon to their care, to be doubted within a few hours of their parting, was a stab, which the sensibility of Abba Thulle could not fupport: the severity and truth of his reproach, and the noble dignity with which he supported himself, brought the daring thought of butchering him and his brothers to view, and gave a most captivating picture of the mild, yet forcible triumph of virtue. They found themselves guilty, and saw evidently that virtue will flourish in whatever foil she is implanted. Without further hesitation, they sent on board for all the arms that could be spared; and on the boat's return presented him with five musquets, five cutlasses, more than half a barrel of gun powder and flints flints and ball in proportion. Once more harmony was restored, and the generous Abba Thulle forgot, or seemed to forget, the cruelty of their suspicions.

The King's fecond fon, Lee Boo, arrived in the evening from Pelew, under the care of his elder brother: Abba Thulle presented him to the Captain, and then to the officers; he advanced in so easy and polite a manner, having much good humour and forcible expression in his aspect, that every one was prepossessed in his favour. As it was now getting dark, the officers went on board, leaving the Captain behind, at the King's request. Next day Mr Wilfon informed them, that neither he, the King, nor the Rupacks, enjoyed much rest; the affectionate father employing the moments in giving advice to his son, and in recommending him to the care care of the Captain; not, however, from the smallest fear that he would be ill-treated: "I would wish you," faid he, " to shew my son every thing that is useful, and make him an Englishman. The fine things he will fee may probably induce him to flip away from you, in fearch of less confined gratification; but I beg that you will contrive to calm and subdue the rashness and impetuofity of his youth. I well know from the different countries he must pass through, that he will be liable to dangers, and even to difeases that we never heard of, which may kill him; but I also know, that death is the common lot; and whether he dies with you, or at Pelew, is of no moment. I know you are a man of humanity; and am therefore confident that if my fon be fick, you will look on him with kindness. But should that that happen, which your utmost care cannot prevent, let it not deter you or your brother, or any of your countrymen, from returning; for I shall rejoice at the fight." The Captain affured the King, that he might rest satisfied of the care and affection with which his fon would be treated.—Before Mr Wilson came on board, he admonished Blanchard (the man who had refolved to renounce his country) as to his conduct among the natives; he defired him to be watchful of the arms and ammunition that would be left behind, that they might defend themselves from their enemies; he begged him not to go naked, like the natives, as it might. lessen his importance with them as an Englishman, and countenance an evident indecency; and that he might have no excuse from the want of cloaths, all that could be spared was left him; in order . .

order, also, that if he accepted the King's offer of wives, he might be enabled to dress them somewhat after his own custom. The Captain did not forget to enforce on him the absolute necessity of continuing his religious duties, and to be particular in keeping Sunday on Sabbath. After this, he was requested to ask any favour that might tend to his future comfort; on which he begged to have one of the ship's compasses, and the mass, sails, and oars belonging to the pinnace, which also was intended to be left behind.

Wednesday morning early, an English jack was hoisted at the mast-head of the Oroolong, and a swivel fired as a signal for sailing; which being explained to the King, he ordered all the provisions on board, which he had brought for our voyage. A great number of canoes surrounded the vessel, loaded with presents, so that it was with difficulty they could avoid being overstocked. When just ready for sea, a boat was sent on shore for the Captain, who then took Blanchard and the men of the boat, into a temporary hut that had been erected; and, making them kneel, offered up thanksgivings to that Power who had supported their fainting spirits through so many hazards and toils, and had at last opened to them the door of deliverance. He repeated his advice to Blanchard, earnestly begging him not to forget his religion.

When Lee Boo came to the wateringplace, there were sent with him three or four dozen of a very sine fruit, similar to the English apple; it is of a sine crimson colour and oblong shape: this is a very rare fruit at Pelew, though there are plenty of them in the different South Sea Islands. One of them was given to every officer, and the remainder kept for Lee Boo.

About eight o'clock, the Captain went on board, attended by Abba Thulle, Lee Boo, the Rupacks and Blanchard. It being doubtful as the veffel was heavily laden with provision, whether, she would be able to get over the reef, it was resolved to land the two six pounders and leave the jolly boat behind, as they had nothing wherewith to repair her, and she was almost worn out; in her room Abba Thulle was at great pains to procure them a proper canoe.

Captain Wilson had recommended Mr Sharp the surgeon to Lee Boo as his Sucalic or friend, and the young man stuck by him, with the greatest attention, attending him to whatever part of the vessel he moved, as his Mentor

Mentor on all occasions. Blanchard now got into his pinnace, in order to take the vessel in tow, and parted from his old ship-mates with as much composure, as if they were to meet again after a fhort absence; he shook hands with them with the same indifference, as if they were about to fail down the Thames on a coasting voyage—a striking contrast to what followed!

The veffel now proceeded towards the reef, deeply laden with Abba Thulle's bounty to a degree of superfluity, and furrounded by great numbers of the natives in their canoes, who had every man brought his present, for their good friends the Englees-What as luxurious fight to a feeling heart! There was no room for them, yet every one exclaimed, only this from me, only this from me, and if refused, they repeated their requests with supplicating R 2

countenances and tears in their eyes. Indeed their generofity and affection were fo urgent, that a few trifles from the nearest of them were accepted; while the others, unable to bear the feeming neglect, paddled a-head, and put their little presents in the pinnace, not knowing that she was again to return to the shore. Several canoes went before the veffel to point out the fafest track; and others were waiting at the reef, to shew them the deepest water: from all these precautions, which were directed by the King, the reef was fortunately cleared without any accident. The King now came along-fide, and gave Lee Boo his bleffing, which the youth received with great respect and tenderness: he next embraced the Captain, in much apparent distress, and then cordially shook hands with all the officers, crying-"You are happy because you are going home, home, and I am happy because you are fo; but still very unhappy at your going away." Once more renewing his assurances of regard and good will, he left the vessel, and went into his canoe. The natives who were to return with the King, looked up to the vessel eagerly, with the most expressive countenances, and half diffolved in tears. This proof of delicate sensibility, and of proved affection, operated fo strongly on the feelings of all aboard, that it was with much difficulty they summoned refolution enough to give three cheers at their final departure. Raa Kook remained, with a few of his attendants, to see them out of danger beyond the reef; but was so highly dejected, that the vessel had gone a great way before he thought of summoning his canoes to return. As he had been their first friend, the Captain gave him a brace of pistols, and a cartouch-box with cartridges: and the moment of separation being now come, he appeared fo much affected, that it was some time before he could speak; pointing to his heart, he faid it was there he felt the pain of bidding them adieu. He endeavoured to converse with Lee Boo, his nephew; but being unable to proceed, he precipitately went into the boat, and giving them an expressive glance, as if his mind was convulsed, he instantly dropped a-stern; and thus terminated our connection with the natives of Pelew, after a residence among them from Sunday the 10th of August 1783, to Wednesday the 12th of November following.

It may not be unseasonable, while the amiable behaviour of these two respectable characters, Abba Thulle and Raa Kook, is fresh in the recollection

lection of the reader, to make a few general observations on their different characters.

Never was a prince more formed to attract and retain the love and admiration of his subjects than Abba Thulle; his appearance majestic, he commanded with authority; while his affability and eafy access, rendered him a semideity, to all his subjects. In one of. his councils, there was as much (we had almost said more) respect paid to his naked unadorned person, as to a European potentate, amidst all his trappings and pageantry, from the furrounding sycophants. His nice honour and quick feelings were very difcernible on many occasions; never was there a reproof more delicate and yet more poignant, than what he gave the English on occasion of the late affair with the musquets. He was far from one of those harmless nothings, who hurt nobody because they have not a sense of injuries; while the warmth and fenfibility of his heart won the love of all around him, his dignity of manner, and propriety of conduct taught them to approach him with respect. He possessed a contemplating mind, and few objects came within his observation, without being attentively confidered. The prosperity of his subjects, was the principal object with him. was this led him to part with his for Lee Boo, whom he tenderly loved-For this he was at fo much pains in examining every thing about the English, that might be serviceable to his people—in fine, his whole attention was engaged in forming and executing plans for the good of the nation and individuals. In domestic life he shone remarkably, and took a particular charge charge of all his own relations; the misbehaviour of his nephew, at which we have already hinted, seemed to give him the greatest pain; while as the husband and parent, his heart seemed awake to every finer feeling which awake dorns humanity.

Accident only has made him acquainted with a few of the rest of mankind; and that accident he considered as the happiest of his life; we may perhaps never hear of him again, but judging from what is already known, he may justly be considered as one of the best of men and of kings.

His brother Raa Kook was a prince of so universally engaging demeanor, and whose every action expressed something so truly valuable, that Englishmen or natives equally admired him. He was so much a friend to the English, lish, that it may be suspected their account of him is partial; therefore little shall here be said, and that little not exaggerated.

His natural temper was cheerful and pleasant, though without that mimicry and humour for which his brother Arra Kooker was remarkable; at the fame time he was far from averse to a good hearty laugh when a proper occasion offered. As commander in chief, he was beloved by them all: he difpensed his orders calmly and smoothly, but would not tolerate neglect. No man better understood the necessity of strict discipline; so that while he encouraged his inferiors to use all becoming freedom with him, he kept them at that proper distance, which is: the true key to cheerful obedience. principles of honour, he was by no means inferior to his brother; and not

not only wished that the English should hold bim in an honourable point of view, but all the nation; thus it was, that he could not bear the least idea of pilfering among them, for, as formerly mentioned, if any thing was amiffing, Raa Kook foon discovered and punished the delinquent. One day, a chief Rupack fought a cutlass from Captain Wilson in his hearing; the frown instantly appeared, nor would he fuffer it to be given him. He was exceedingly delicate in receiving favours himself; and though from his particular disposition in enquiring after causes and effects, many things about the English were very highly prized by him, he was particularly attentive, that nothing should betray any desire for what he thought might not be proper to be given. The reader has already feen, his agreeable deportment in his family; even to a degree which many in this age of dissipation and stoicism might reckon silly; but let it be noticed, that though the finer feelings shone in the natives of Pelew, to a length many in Britain would call esseminate—yet in fatigue, pain, distress and death, they appeared as heroes indeed.

Before we proceed to mention the future fortunes of our navigators, the following chapter is introduced to mention fuch observations on the manners and customs of these amiable people, as are thought interesting.

CHAP.

CHAP. VI.

General Description of the Islands—Productions—Natives—Dress—Dispositions—Manners—Religion—Marriages—Customs—General Character—Government—Precedency, &c.

AS the Antelope was not a vessel fitted out for discovery, and furnished with scientific gentlemen, qualified for making many philosophic observations, the naturalist, or philosopher, must wait the issue of more particular discoveries and enquiries. Men distressed with the dread of perpetual exile, and whose attention was almost wholly occupied about their deliverance, were not the persons for tracing nature accurately in her various appearances and effects.

The Pelew Islands, or as some call them the Palos Islands, are situated between 130° and 136° of east longitude from London, and 5° and 9° north latitude. They are long and narrow, lying in north and east direction. They are plentifully covered with wood of various kinds; fuch as the Cabbage Tree, Ebony, and a species of the Manchineel, the fap of which, when it touches the skin, occasions an immediate swelling and bliftering; this was the tree, which they confidered as unlucky. But their three most remarkable trees, we in Britain are totally strangers to; one is a very pretty tree, and upon boring a hole in it, a thick substance like cream distills from it: another is very like a cherry tree in its manner of branching; it has a very thin cover, which is not properly a bark, being vas close in the texture as the inner wood, which is very hard; none of the English tools could stand to work it: in colour it is very like, though still prettier than mahogany, hogany: the last is like an almond tree, the natives call it carambolla. Beetlenuts, yams, cocoa-nuts and bread-fruit, are their staple articles of livelihood, about which they are principally concerned; and a few oranges, lemons and the jamboo apple (those brought to Lee Boo on his departure) are their delicates. They have no grain. The islands are in general well cultivated, as the natives spare no pains; all their labour confifts in fishing and the cultivation of their grounds. man had his own piece of ground fo long as he inclined to dwell there; but if he left it for another, it returned to the King, as chief proprietor, who bestowed it on the next that applied for it. One thing was very discernible, that every man had his own canoe, which he kept facred. , ,

It has already been mentioned; that there are no quadrupeds on the island, except rats. Birds of different kinds were observed flying about, some of them very beautiful, but the greater part of them are those which are known by the name of tropic birds. Whether from their peculiar kinds, or the echoing in the wood, is not eafily determined, but the English were ready to think their notes had a very peculiar melody; one in particular, was uncommonly fweet, but though the found appeared quite at hand, none of the birds could be noticed. But we must not omit to mention, that the English have probably taught them a lesson which may be of great service to them; the islands abounded with common cocks and hens, which the natives confidered as a very useless animal, and therefore took no pains about them, but but left them to wander wild through the woods; at times they would have eaten their eggs, provided they were to their taste, that is, not fresh or lately laid; but if containing an imperfect chicken, they were delicious. They were now however taught to eat the slesh of the fowls, which they soon found to be a very palatable food.

Few parts of the globe are so well supplied with sish of all kinds, particularly mullets, crabs, oysters, muscles, &c. but the sish most esteemed among them is the shark, the greater part of which they reckon delicious. Several kinds of shell sish, they eat quite raw, in preference to dressed. They have few fresh-water sish, as there are no rivers on the islands, only a few pools and small springs, &c. Their method of preserving their sish, has been already noticed; they have no salt, and have little conception of fauce or seasoning to any thing they eat. Sometimes they boiled both sish and vegetables in saltwater, but this was no improvement; but when they eat any thing raw, they squeeze a little orange or lemon juice upon it.

They get up betimes in the morning, and their first work is to bathe. There are particular places appointed for this; and a man dares not approach the women's bathing places, without previously giving a particular halloo, of which, if no notice is taken, he may proceed, but if they halloo in return, he must immediately retire. They breakfast about eight, and proceed to public business or any other employment till noon, when they dine; they sup about sun-set, and very soon after retire to rest.

The

The reader will have observed frequent mention is made of sweetmeats in this narrative, a more particular account of which may be proper. They had various forts; one was prepared by scraping the kernel of the cocoanut into a pulp, and then mixing it up with orange juice and sweet drink. This sweet drink is a composition of the juice of sweet canes, which the island produces plentifully. This mixture they generally simmered over a flow fire, which when warm they made up into lumps; it soon turned so hard that a knife would scarce cut it. This the English called Choak-dog, but the natives called it Woolell. Another fort is made up of the fruit of the tree just mentioned like the almond tree; and on one occasion they presented Captain Willon with some liquid sweet meats, meats, which they prepare from a root fomewhat fimilar to our turnips.

The natives are in general stout, well made and athletic; many of them appeared to be uncommonly strong; they are in general about the middle fize, and univerfally of one tinge as to colour, not wholly black, but a very deep copper colour. The men have their left ear bored, and the women both; they wore a particular leaf, and at times an ornament of shell in the perforated ear. Their noses are also ornamented, by a flower or fweet shrub, fluck through the cartilage between the nostrils. This custom is not peculiar to Pelew, but is found in many eastern nations, and probably proceeds from their great desire for sweet scents; and though at first it appeared rather disagreeable, from want of use, it is certainly a more pleafant and becoming refreshment refreshment to the nose, than the use of tobacco either by fnuffing or plugging. Their teeth we have already mentioned are died black; but the Engdish could never learn the method it was done, nor more about it than that it was accomplished by means of some herbs when young, and the operation was very painful. The tatooing the body is also done in youth, though not altogether in childhood. The only appearance of any thing like dress among these natives is in the female sex, who in general wear a piece of mat, or the hulks of cocoa-nut died, about nine or ten inches deep, round their waist; some of these aprons are very neatly made, and ornamented with beads, &c. Abba Thulle's daughter Erré Bess, gave Henry Wilson a present of a very neat one to carry to his little fifter.

It has in general been granted, that mankind however ignorant and favage, are still possessed of conscience, and the internal knowledge of a certain something, their superior, to which they are accountable; nor has any class of men yet been discovered who have not some outward rite or ceremony whereby this knowledge is expressed. However superstitious, enthusiastical, dor foolish their different modes of worship may appear, to those who have been bleft with revelation, nay, however, much we may be puzzled to investigate a cause, to which the fingularity of some of their religious rites are to be attributed, yet still the existence of one Great First Cause or ruling Deity has been acknowledged, not in word only, but by some outward ceremony or rite. To deny that any fuch custom exists at Pelew, and yet that they acknowledge knowledge a Superior Power, may be confidered rash, yet, from the most attentive observations and enquiries the English could make, they have reason to believe that is the case. Weither place, time nor circumstance, could be observed as pointing to any worship or religious rite; nor could the English collect any thing from their conversation, though particularly questioned on the subject, from which they could discover their ideas concerning the God of nature. The most probable conjecture is, that the inward monitor, at which we have just been hinting, leads them to think of fome directing chance, good and bad, without any percife idea further.

In order that the reader may somehow be enabled to judge for himself in this particular, he may recollect the following circumstances already mentioned—The unlucky wood which Abba Thulle mentioned to Captain Wilson -Raa Kook's behaviour in the old woman's house with the nuts, &c. after his fon's funeral—and the muttering which took place on feveral occasions, mentioned through the preceding It was very clear, that they had some strong fixed idea of Divination; when Lee Boo set out to sea, he was for feveral days uncommonly fick; and he then told Mr Sharp, he was fure his father and friends were very forry for him, for they knew what he underwent. He was prepossessed with the fame idea when dying, as we will foon have occasion to mention. Indeed, on one occasion, while in Britain, he feemed to intimate that they understood the spirit existed even after death; as upon occasion of Captain Wilson's informing him the intention of going to church, being to reform men's lives, and that they might go to heaven, he replied, that at Pelew, bad men stay on earth, and good men grow very beautiful and afcend into the sky. When Mr Barker fell from the fide of the veffel, the natives faid it was owing to the unlucky wood being in the vessel; and upon several other occasions seemed to hint at the effects of a superior power. One particular mode of divination was observed, and considered to be peculiar to the King, as none but he used it. They have a plant, not unlike our bulrush, by splitting the leaves of which and applying to the middle finger, he judged of the fuccess of any occurrence of moment; before the first expedition to Artingall, it was noticed that the answer was very favourable, but when about to fet fail on the fecond, the oracle did not appear pear altogether fo agreeable; Abba Thulle therefore would not fuffer them to enter their canoes, until he had twifted his leaves, till as he thought they appeared more favourable. On this subject we shall only further add, that the respectful attentive silence of the natives, while the English were at worfhip, feemed to indicate, that although they knew nothing of any religious forms of worship, yet they were not insensible of the existence of one Great Supreme Cause, who rewarded and punished according as deeds should merit; and hence that strong sense of propriety, justice and delicacy, which produced among them the strictest morality.

The general character of these natives of Pelew is now pretty well imprinted on the reader's mind, a very few additional observations are therefore fore necessary. Humanity is the prominent feature in the picture; the English were cast upon their territories, in a state the most helpless that can well be conceived; twenty seven men, without even common necessaries of life, entirely dependent on their bounty; fed, supported, assisted in their labours, and every thing done for them that was in their power. Let us only for a moment confider the hourly bounty which was poured in upon them, not of their useless provender, but, as the English had many occasions to observe, their best provisions were given to their strangers, while many perhaps were fcanty enough at home. Only recollect the parting scene-see the crowding canoes holding out prefents, not the distant effects of complaisance, but the warm effusions of philanthropy!-Could ostentation, pride, or the hope of

of retribution influence them? by no means—it was kindness to men they never expected to see again.

Their native politeness was constantly observable; possessing a degree of curiofity, beyond any of the South-sea natives, they never knowingly intruded when it was inconvenient; in them it was evident that good manners are the natural refult of good sense. The attention paid by the men of Pelew to their wives, was very uncommon in most parts of the world; and even a British husband might at times get a lesson. Their marriages seemed to confist in a serious solemn contract without any formal ceremony, but they are strictly faithful to one another; and the utmost decency of behaviour is uniformly supported. A husband never sleeps with his wife when pregnant, but during that period the greatest attention tion is paid to her, in order that she may be kept eafy. A plurality of wives is allowed, though they generally confine themselves to two, a Rupack three, and the King five: they name the children soon after born, without any ceremony. One of Abba Thulle's wives bore him a fon while the English were there, which he named Captain, to the memory of Captain Wilson. They are far from being naturally lascivious, and the utmost decency is preserved among the natives; one of the failors endeavoured to pay his addresses to a female, but was rebuffed in a manner that prevented any further attempts.

They are in general an active, laborious set of people, possessing the greatest resolution in cases of danger, patience under missortunes, and resignation at their death. Except a few Rupacks there was little subordination of rank, (and of that we will speak prefently) confequently their employments were pretty much the same; fencing their plantations, planting their yams, making hatchets, building houfes and canoes, mending and preparing fishing tackle, forming darts and warlike weapons with domestic utenfils, and burning chinam, may be faid to comprise the whole round of their employments. Those who had a particular turn for mechanical operations or any uncommon pieces of work, they called Tackelbys; it was to them the King fo often gave particular orders to obferve the building of the Schooner. Idleness was tolerated in none; the women were as laborious as the men, and the King and Rupacks were as much employed as any. Abba Thulle was the best maker of hatchets in the island; and generally laboured at them when

when disengaged from affairs of state; they had no idea of unemployed time, and therefore it is, that without the proper tools for finishing a fine piece of work, practice had taught them, even with their coarse implements, to execute, what a British Artist, could not have conceived practicable. Their mats, baskets and ornaments are so curiously wrought, that when their simple tools are considered, the ingenuity is more to be admired, than much superior productions executed under the advantages which European mechanics enjoy.

That equality of station which appeared evidently among them, and ignorance of those luxuries which civilization intruduces, proved no inconsiderable source of happiness to them; the one prevented that ambition which is often so destructive to society, and the other those cares which affluence affluence awakens. In all the connection which the English had with them, robbery or rapine were never named among them; nature it is true, allowed them little, but that little they enjoyed with content. Human nature here shone in most amiable colours; men appeared as brethren; uninformed and unenlightened, they grasped at nothing more than competency and health; linked together as in one common cause, they mutually supported each other; courteous, affable, gentle and humane, their little state was cemented in bonds of harmony; ----but a short account of their government may be proper.

Abba Thulle, the King was the chief person in the state, and all the homage of royalty was accordingly paid to his person. He was supreme in the greater part of the islands which came within thin the observation of the English; but Artingall, Pelelew, Emungs and Emellegree appeared to be independent, tho' from any thing that could be observed or learned, their form of Government was fimilar. The general mode of making obeifance to the King, was by putting their hands behind them and bowing towards the ground; and this custom prevailed not only when passing him in the streets or fields, but when they passed the house in which they supposed him to be. His carriage and demeanour was stately and dignified, and he supported his station very becomingly. He devoted the forenoon to public business, and decided every matter of state by a council of Rupacks. They affembled in a square pavement in the open air, the King being remarkable from being placed in the centre, on a stone of larger size than those of the the Rupacks. They feemed to deliver their minds with freedom, as matters occurred; and the affembly was diffolved by the King rifing up. The afternoon was devoted to receiving petitions, hearing requests, and deciding controversies; these it may easily be supposed feldom occurred, for as their property was small and of little value; and as there were no lawyers nor their emissaries to foment disputes, the proper barriers of right and wrong were easily defined. Wrangles and fighting feldom happened, for even a dispute between children was checked by a severe frown, and their impetuosity bridled. When any real injury was done by any one to his neighbour, it was a pleasing fight to fee how justice was administered; their laws were the simple dictrees of conscience as to right and wrong hetween between man and man; no rhetoric or enticing words of wisdom were employed to mask vice under the cloak of virtue; none of these subterfuges could be employed whereby fraud and oppression could be screened; oaths were unknown, and the simple dictates of truth directed the judge; nor were there any punishment of a corporeal kind; being convicted of injuring a neighbour was to them more galling and disgraceful, than any pillory yet invented by British ingenuity.

Messages were transmitted to the King with great ceremony; the messenger never was admitted into the presence, but delivered it to an inferior Rupack, who delivered the message to the King, and brought his answer.

The General was next in authority to the King, and acted for him in his absence; he summoned the Rupacks to attend when needed, and had the chief command of all the forces; tho' it was observed, that in actual engagement, when the King was prefent he himself officiated. The General succeeded the King in case of his death, and on his demise, Arra Kooker; when the fovereignty would again revert to Abba Thulle's eldest son, then Lee Boo and fo on. The King had always an attendant, who though not so high in office as the General, was more constantly about his person. He was confidered as the principal Minifter, and a man of judgment; he never bore arms, nor went on the warlike expeditions. It was remarked that he had only one wife, and never invited any of the English to his house.

The Rupacks were very numerous, and confidered in the fame light as the nobility arc in Britain. They were of different different orders, distinguishable by the fize and quality of the Bone, of which Captain Wilson belonged to the highest rank. They all attended the King on command, every one bringing with him, a certain number of dependants, with their canoes, spears and darts. The reader will be apt here to trace a fimilitude to the feudal system; but as the knowledge the English acquired of these matters was very superficial, nothing very conclusive can be ascertain-These and many other matters ed. must be left for time to develope; all that can be faid further at present is, that whatever was their precise mode of government, it was wonderfully adapted for the people. All the islands appeared populous, but the number is not easily conjectured. There were four thousand active men in the expedition against Pelelew, and it was evident, U many more were left at home, not heing needed.

The method they took for building houses, was very ingenious. They raifed them three feet from the ground, in order to prevent damp; this space they filled up with solid stone and overlaid with thick plank as a floor. The walls were built of wood, very closely interwoven with bamboos and palm leaves, fo that no cold nor wet could possibly come through; the roof was pointed in the same manner as village houses are in this country. Their windows come down on a level with the floor, anfwering for doors also; and have a fort of shutters, which they fill up the chasm with, when necessary; their, fires are kindled in the centre of the room (for all the house is in one room) the fire place being funk lower than the floor, with no timber below it, the whole whole space being filled up with small stones, &c. Their houses for public meetings are about 70 feet long, but the common dwelling houses do not, exceed forty.

Their spears have already been mentioned, it is thought only necessary to add concerning them, that they were barbed transversely, so that if once they were stuck in the slesh, it was impossible to extract them. One of their most effective weapons in war is the dart and fling; the darts are thrown by means of an instrument, not unlike what is called a cross-bow in this country; upon a strong straight piece of wood the dart is laid, and on one end of the wood is fixed an elastic piece of bamboo, by compressing which with greater or less force, they throw the dart to the distance of sifty or fixty feet as they incline; it is aftonishing how exactly U_2 actly they can direct this weapon, and the distance at which it proves mortal. They have daggers about thirteen inches in length, which are made of bones of fish; and some of the Rupacks had also a kind of sword, made of very hard wood and inlaid with shells.

Their canoes are admirable workmanship; they are made of the trunks of large trees, in the same manner with those throughout the South-seas, but with furprifing neatness; they ornament them with shells and paint them red. It has already been mentioned, that the natives painted the Schooner for the English, and as their method is peculiar, it may be proper to mention it. They take the red ochre and crumble it down among water, then foak it for some time over a slow fire; when it is brought to the necessary confistence, confistence, they rub it on the wood, while warm; when dry, they varnish it with cocoa-nut oil, which gives it a polish that no water can efface. Their canoes are of different fizes, but the largest will not carry more than thirty people; the common ones, from five to ten. They use sails made of matting, which are by no means capable to encounter a rough sea, they therefore keep as near the shore as possible. The natives row with great ability, infomuch, that the canoes made purposely for swift sailing, seem scarcely to touch the water, moving with a velocity unknown to our boatmen; their dexterity in handling the oars is admirable, when on visits of ceremony, they flourish their paddles with great address and exact order. Their domestic implements are few in number and very fimple; they are the evident productions answer the ends intended, without much ornament. Their little baskets which they always carry about with them, are among their neatest pieces of workmanship; in them they carry their nuts, knife, string, and any other little article they may need for the work about which they are employed. They are also hung up around the walls of their houses for ornament and use. Their knives are made of shells which they sharpen to such an edge as fully answers all common purposes.

Their fishing hooks were ingeniously formed of tortoise-shell, and their combs of the orange tree; the mats on which they slept, and those with which they were covered when assep, were formed of the husks of cocoa-nuts. They have a number of vessels made of earthen ware, for purposes fes of cookery; they stand the heat exceedingly well, if heated by degrees, of which the natives are very careful. Their strings, cords, and fishing-nets are all manufactured from the husks of cocoa-nuts. Their drinking cups are made of cocoa-shells, which they polish with great art. But the hatchets are the most uncommon weapons; the blade is made of a very strong species of cockle, which they call Kima Cockle, ground to a sharp edge; they were very anxious however for iron to fubstitute in its room. Some of their hatchets were made with moveable heads, with which they could answer the principal purposes of an adze; so that though their tools were not remarkable for beauty or convenience, yet the English were often furprised with what facility they cut down the largest trees with them.

Their

Their articles for ornament were far from numerous; the King had a very fine tureen, somewhat in shape of a bird, and finely ornamented with various devices, very neatly cut out upon it, this he made a present of to Captain Wilson; it held about 36 English quarts. The tortoise-shell they wrought into various little dishes, spoons, trays and other vessels; the shell they have in these islands is of a very beautiful kind, but their manner of working it, the English could never get an opportunity of observing.

The torches they use have been frequently mentioned; they seemed to be a rosin mixed with small pieces of a particular species of wood, which burns well; they have a clear light, and an agreeable smell.

Having now recapitulated fuch obfervations as the English had opportunity

nity to make during their short residence among them, it may not be improper to glance a little at fuch parts of their conduct as seem to disagree with that strong humanity and urbanity which have been uniformly represented as distinguishing characteristics in these natives of Pelew. Several instances have been given of their noble principles not being confined to their intercourse with one another, but that to their enemies, they behave with a degree of generofity totally unknown among nine tenths of mankind. Where is the nation that scorns to attack their enemy unfeen or by night? What people fend embassies to herald their approach? But it may be asked, how can it be accounted for, that these friends of humanity, should so wantonly take away the lives of their fellow creatures, when captivated in battle: An answer to this has already been attempted; the practice has but very lately taken place, and is the refult of what they imagined to be political necessity. They confidered a captive as a most dangerous person among them; no prisons, nor public works to employ them in, so that had they not put them to death, they would have been very troublesome companions.

The reader may also have noticed in the course of the narration, an inclination to pilser, perhaps inconsistent with that character of integrity we have been just mentioning. The circumstances however should be carefully weighed; a nail, or bit of old iron, was to them a precious jewel; and the commonalty had almost no opportunity of getting any, except in the way of picking them up when they accidentally fell in their way; they very seldom took when the temptation was so peculiarly singular that even the rigidly virtuous would easily find an excuse for it; it may well be said, "that they must have been more than men, had they acted less like men. Virtuous in the extreme that country would be deemed where the conscience of no individual, in the cool moments of reslection, could upbraid him with a heavier transgression, than applying to his own use a bit of iron that lay before him."

CHAP. VII.

Passage to Macao—Proceed to Canton and Embark for England—Anecdotes of Lee Boo—His Distress and Death.—

THE English were now once more on the way to all they held dear, and and having wiped away the tear of a friendly farewel, proceeded on their voyage with chearfulness; the first two days the weather proved very tolerable; the wind varied from E. to S. E.

The principal person that will figure in the few following pages, is the highly valued Prince Lee Boo, a youth of the most remarkable abilities, and in whose history every reader must feel He had thrown himself interested. freely into the protection of strangers, deserting his native country, his friends, his all, trusting to the honour of a handful of men of whose existence he had but a few weeks before been utterly ignorant. For a few days he fuffered excessively from sea sickness, in which fituation he could eat nothing, but was quite funk in his spirits; this however wore off when he appeared to be easy and contented. Captain Wilfon fon now instructed him as to decency in his appearance, and desired he would dress as they did; he did so, but soon threw off the coat and jacket as infupportably cumbersome; but still retained the trowsers, as decency required, and would never afterwards part with them; indeed, as they began gradually to advance into a colder climate, he foon refumed the coat and jacket also. His notions of delicacy from what had been told him, and what he observed among the English, gradually increafed, fo that he would not fo much as change any part of his dress unless when by himself. He continued to wash himself several times a day, and kept his clothes and every thing about his person very clean.

Sunday the 16th they kept a fort of thanksgiving to God for their deliverance, for which it may be safely said, they were all very grateful. They now also discovered a small leak in the veffel, which they found it impossible wholly to stop, they therefore employed two men constantly at the pump, which kept it under. Lee Boo was greatly discouraged at losing sight of land, a circumstance which had not previously, occurred to him. From the 18th to the 25th of November, they had variable and difagreeable weather, heavy fqualls, accompanied with thunder and lightning. On the 25th they came in fight of the Bashee Islands to the great joy of Lee Boo, who was happy once more, with at least a distant fight of terra firma. On the 26th they saw the island of Formosa, bearing N. E.; the 27th and 28th, the weather being favourable, they fell in with feveral Chinese nese fishing vessels and small craft, and on the 20th anchored near the high land called Asses Ears. Having here engaged a pilot to conduct them to Macao, they arrived there next day. Lee Boo was greatly aftonished at the fize of the Portuguese ships in the Typa, calling out clow, clow, muc clow! that is, large, large, very large! The Governor paid Captain Wilson and his crew all manner of attention, and fent plenty of provisions of all kinds to the men onboard the Oroolong, informing them at same time, that peace was now re-eftablished in Europe. Captain Wilson, Lee Boo and the officers got lodgings appointed them on shore, except Mr Benger who took the command on board. An express was immediately forwarded to the Company's fupra-cargoes at Canton, informing of their arrival and fituation.

Mr M'Intyre an old acquaintance of Captain Wilson's paid them uncommon attention, and infifted on their lodging in his house. He had a Portuguese Gentleman in company with him, who invited them to his house on their way. to Mr M'Intyre's, and that principally on Lee Boo's account, with whom he was greatly taken, and wished to introduce him to his family. His house was therefore the first into which Lee Boo entered, and his furprise on entering it cannot be eafily described. The rooms, the furniture and ornaments, all feverally crowded fo many new objects on his mind at once, that he was perfectly lost in amazement; it was remarkable however, that amidst all his confusion, his behaviour was to the greatest degree easy and polite; and as he observed that he occasioned the same surprise in others that they did in him, him, he very politely permitted them to examine his hands, described the tatooing, and appeared pleased with the attention paid him. On their way to Mr M'Intyre's, Lee Boo displayed his native benevolence very remarkably: observing the poor Tartar women, with their children tied to their backs, begging, he distributed all the oranges and other things he had about him among them.

When they reached Mr M'Intyre's it was late, so that the table was covered for supper, and the room elegantly illuminated; a new scene here burst upon him—the whole seemed to him a scene of magic. It is impossible to particularise every thing with which he was remarkably fascinated; a large mirror at the upper end of the room, rivetted his attention for a while; he saw his complete person, and supposed it to be fomebody behind very like himself; he looked, laughed, and looked again, not knowing what to think. Indeed the mirror had a furprifing effect on more than Lee Boo; the Englishmen had seen every one his neighbour's face, during all their diffress, but nobody had feen his own; the hollow edged, long vifag'd appearance they now made, to what they formerly recollected, cast rather a melancholy impression upon their minds. Next day Lee Boo spent mostly in examining Mr M'Intyre's house, in which he found abundance of new objects to surprise The other Gentlemen in the mean time went about purchasing such little commodities as they stood in need of, and every one brought in some little trinket with him for Lee Boo; among the rest, was a string of large glass beads, which almost distracted the poor Prince Prince with surprise and joy. conceived himself possessed of greater treasures than all the Pelew islands could afford; he run to Captain Wilson enraptured with his property, and begged that a small Chinese vessel might be hired to transport them to Pelew, and defired his father might be informed the Englees had carried him to a fine country, from whence he would foon send him other presents; at same time adding, that if the persons Captain Wilson should employ, faithfully and expeditiously executed their trust, he would reward them with two glass beads; --- Happy state of innocence, where the utmost ambition can be so eafily fatisfied.

While at Macao, Lee Boo had frequent opportunities of seeing people of different nations, but soon gave a decided preference to the English, especially mentioned that there are no quadrupeds at the Pelew Islands, and that the Newfoundland dog left there, was the first of the species they had seen; they called him failor, which name Lee Boo now applied to every quadruped he saw. Horses were his great favourites, he called them clow failor or great sailor; he would often go to the stable and stroke their mane and neck, and soon ventured to mount them. He intreated Captain Wilson to send a horse to his uncle Raa Kook.

In a few days Captain Wilson received letters from Canton; the supra cargoes desiring him to draw for what money he needed, and ordering the men to be supplied with every necessary in abundance. The kindness shewn them on this occasion by all ranks at Macao and Canton, all the officers and men

men speak of in the warmest terms. Captain Wilson, and his company took shipping for Whampoa in the Walpole Captain Churchill, leaving Mr Benger to take care of the Oroolong, and difpose of her. In a few days they arrived at Canton, having been kept in spirits all the way by Lee Boo, whose admiration at every new object and fenfible remarks, at fame time, furprifed all who had an opportunity of converfing him. He was greatly furprised at the various dishes of meat, which he faw fuccessively set before them, alledging, that his father, though a King, was happy to serve himself with a few yams and cocoa-nuts; while here, the Gentlemen had a great many different dainties, and fervants attending them while they were eating. Observing a man drunk, he faid he would not drink drink spirits, as it made him unlike a man.

An instance of Lee Boo's strong attachment to those he knew, may be here mentioned, which will ferve to point out this striking feature not in his character only, but in all the natives of Pelew. One day while fitting at a window which looked towards the fea, he observed a boat making towards. shore, in which were Mr Benger and Mr M'Intyre, his joy was fo great, that he did not take time to tell Captain Wilson or any other in the room the cause of his emotion, but springing from his feat, flew to the shore in a twinkling; immediately on their landing he shook hands with them so heartily and with fuch expressions of affection, as won their warmest regard. They had disposed of the schooner for feven feven hundred Spanish dollars, which was considered as a very good price.

Lee Boo became an universal favourite wherever he appeared; his agreeable good natured pleafant behaviour, made him acceptable in every company. He one day very much furprised a: company of gentlemen with his dexterity in throwing the dart; a party was formed to have a trial of skill in the factory hall; they hung up a gauze cage and a bird painted in the middle; they stood at a good distance, and with much difficulty hit even the cage; when Lee Boo's turn came, he took up his spear very carelessly, and with the greatest ease, struck the little bird through the head. He had one day an opportunity of feeing some blue glass, which greatly delighted him; it was a colour he had not before feen; the gentleman in whose house it was, made made him a present of two jarrs of the same colour, which greatly delighted him; Oh! were it possible he exclaimed, that my friends at Pelew could see them!

As the time was now near at hand when the company's ships would fail for England, Captain Wilson laid before his people an account of the produce from the Oroolong, and other articles which had been fold; and giving to every one an equitable share, he addressed the whole company nearly as follows: "Gentlemen, the moment being now arrived when every one may to advantage follow his own inclination, I cannot part with you, without testifying my approbation at the spirited, the judicious, and the manly conduct you have preserved, amidst our trying difficulties; and be assured, that, on my arrival in England, I will represent you to the Company as entitled titled to their particular regard, and I make no doubt but they will reward your toils." If mutual adversity will reconcile the most inveterate enemies, furely the sufferings of friends must rivet a more forcible affection; and every one now prefent, appeared to feel the weight of the remark, for a tender concern was manifest in every countenance. The conduct of Mr Wilson had been so mild and prudent, and his example so animating, they still wished him for their commander: but it was not now a time for choice; necessity and reason pointed out their course. Lee Boo and the Captain came home in the Morse, and the surgeon in the Lascelles; while others embarked in different ships.

What has already been mentioned concerning the amiable Lee Boo, has no doubt interested every reader in his history, history, in which we hope to be excufed, if regard for a favourite subject, should lead us to be at times triflingly minute, as some readers may think.

The Morfe was commanded by Captain Elliott, with whom Lee Boo made himself very happy; his spirit of enquiry concerning various objects which he faw, began now to be directed more concerning their utility than formerly; and he shewed no small anxiety to pick up as much knowledge as possible concerning fuch articles as would be useful at Pelew. His method of keeping his Journal is very noticeable; he had a string on which he cast a knot for every remarkable object he wished to imprint on his memory; these knots he examined daily, and by recollecting the circumstances which occasioned their being cast, he imprinted the transactions on his memory: the officers of the the Morse humourously remarked when they saw him referring to his hempen tablet, that he was reading his Journal. He was not forgetful of the crew of the Oroolong, about whom hemade frequent enquiries. Early in the voyage, he asked for a book, that with assistance he might learn the English alphabet, which was given him. At St Helena he was surprised at the fight of the foldiers, and the cannon on the fortifications; and four men of war arriving during his stay there, afforded new matter of astonishment. On being taken to see a school, he appeared so conscious of his own deficiency, that he begged he might learn like the boys. While here he had also opportunities of riding on horseback of which he was very fond; he galloped with great eafe, and fat his horse very gracefully. Before the Morse sailed from St Hele-Y 2

na, the Lascelles arrived there, so that he had an interview with his first friend Mr Sharp; he was exceedingly happy with that Gentleman for whom he had the greatest regard. When the Morse approached the British channel, the number of ships that passed, confounded his Journal, and he was obliged to discontinue his memorandums. But on landing at Portsmouth, the objects that met his view were for stupenduous and grand, he was involved in filent aftonishment, asking noquestions whatever. The Captain proceeded to London, impatient to fee his family, and left Lee Boo under the protection of his brother; who, however, foon after fet off in a stage-coach, with his innocent charge. Describing his journey, he said he had been put into a little house, which horses ran away with with, and that though he went to sleep, he did not stop travelling.

On his arrival in London, he was not a little happy to meet with his Mentor, his new father, whom he was afraid he had loft. Being shewn his chamber, he could not conceive the use of the bed, it being a four post one and of course different from what he had seen on board: before he would repose himself, he jumped in and out of it feveral times, to admire its form, and intimating that here there was a house for every thing; it was all fine country, fine streets, fine coach, and house upon house up to the sky-for the huts at Pelew being only one story, he: confidered every floor here as a distinct. Captain Wilson introduced house. Lee Boo to fome of the East-India Directors, and to most of his friends; and at the same time shewed him the most Y_3 conspicuous conspicuous public buildings; but his prudent conductor kept him from stage and other exhibitions, left the heat of of the place might communicate the fmall-pox. He was fent to an acadedemy at Rotherhithe, where he was very assiduous in learning to read and, write: and he foon became the favourite of all his schoolfellows, from his gentleness and affability. During the hours of recess, he amused his benefactor's family by mimicking fuch peculiarities as he observed in the boys at school. He said that when he returned to Pelew, he would keep an academy himself; and he imagined the great men of his country would think him very wife when he shewed them their letters. He always called his patron, Captain; but he would address Mrs Wilson no otherwise than his Mother, although he was to cold to the contrary; contrary; conceiving it a tender expression. When he saw the young asking charity, he was highly offended, saying they ought to work; but the supplication of the old and infirm met his natural benevolence—" Must give poor old man; old man no able to work."

About this time he appeared to be about twenty years of age, middle fized; so with having a most expressive countenance much sensibility and good humour, that he instantly prejudiced one in his favour; his eyes were so strikingly expressive that though he knew very little English, his meaning was easily understood.

This quickness of manner and readiness of apprehension were astonishing; a young lady with whom he was one day in company sat down to the harpsichord, in order to discover how it assected him; to the music he paid little attention, attention, but he was greatly interested to discover how the sounds were produced. He at same time sung a song in the Pelew style, but it was very harsh. He was naturally polite; one day at dinner, Mrs Wilson desired him to help her to some cherries, when Lee Boo very quickly proceeded to take them up with his singers; she pleasantly hinted his error, when he immediately took up a spoon, at the same time his countenance was in a moment suffused with a blush.

Captain Wilson, one day, happening to rebuke his son for sometrishing neglect in the presence of Lee Boo, the generous youth was not happy till he had joined their hands, which he did with the tears of sensibility streaming from his eyes. He preserved riding in a coach to every other conveyance, as it allowed people, he said, an opportunity of talking together: he was fond of going to church, because he knew it was a religious duty, the object and final end being the same both at Pelew and in England. He was prefent at Lunardi's aerial afcension; and remarked, that it was a ridiculous mode of travelling, as it could be done so much easier in a coach. He narrowly observed all plants and fruit-trees, and faid he should take some seeds of each to Pelew. Indeed, in all his pursuits, he never lost fight of what benefits they might might tend to in his country. But in the midst of his innocent researches, just as he was getting a quick knowledge of the language, he was taken ill of the dreaded small-pox: Dr Smith immediately attended him, who, in the first stage of the disorder predicted the fatal consequences which ensued. He cheerfully took the medicines that were administered; administered; and willingly dispensed with the fight of Mr Wilson, when he was told that he never had the diforder, and that it was infectious. In the midst of his illness, hearing that Mrs Wilson was confined to her chamber, he cried-" What, mother bad-Lee Boo get up to see her:" which he actually did. Mr Sharp, the furgeon of the Antelope, also attended him. Viewing himself in a glass just before his death, he turned his head away in disgust, at the appearance of his face, which was much swelled and disfigured. Getting worse, and sensible of his approaching fate, he fixed his eyes attentively on Mr Sharp, and faid-"Good friend, when you go to my country, tell my father, that Lee Boo take much drink to make the fmall-poxgo away, but he die—that Captain and Mother very kind—all English very good good men—was much forry he could not tell Abba Thulle the great many fine things the English got." He then enumerated all the presents he had received, which he begged the furgeon to distribute among his friends and the Rupacks. The dying discourse of this child of nature so affected the man who attended him, that he could not help fobbing most piteously, which Lee Boo observing, asked-" Why should he cry so, because Lee Boo die?" Thinking Mrs Wilson's illness arose from his own, he would frequently cry out, she being only in an adjoining chamber, Lee Boo do well, mother:" The dreadful moment of separation being now arrived, he told Mr Sharp he was going away;" and yielded his last breath without apprehension, and with that native innocence and fimplicity which had marked his every action.

tion. The family, the servants, and those who knew him, could not withhold the tears of affectionate regard, when informed of the melancholy event; The East-India Company ordered Lee Boo to be buried in Rotherhithe church-yard, with every possible mark of respect: all who knew him, with the pupils at the academy, attended the funeral; and the concourse was otherwise so great, that it might be supposed his good qualities had been publicly proclaimed, instead of being privately communicated. A tomb, with this inscription was soon after erected by the East-India Company:

Of Prince Lee Boo,

A Native of the Pelew or Palos Islands;

And fon to Abba Thulle, Rupack or King

Of the Island Coorooraa*;

Who departed this Life on the 27th of December 1784, Aged 20 Years,

This Stone is Infcribed,

By the Honourable United East India Company,
As a Testimony of Esteem

For the Humane and Kind Treatment

Afforded by his Father, to the Crew of their Ship,

The Antelope, CAPT. WILSON,
Which was wrecked off that Island
In the Night of the 9th of August 1783.

Stop, Reader, stop! Let Nature claim a Tear; A Prince of mine, Lee Boo, lies bury'd here.

This amiable young prince, whose residence here was only five months, conformed himself to the English dress in every instance, except his hair, which he continued to wear after the Z fashion fashion of his own country. He was of a middling stature; and his countenance was so expressive, that it depicted the best qualities of a virtuous mind: his eyes were lively and intelligent; and his whole manner, gentle and interesting: he had the natural politeness of a gentleman, without the drudgery of study, or the observance of established forms of ceremony. After his death it was found that he had laid by all the seeds or stones of fruit he had eat after his arrival, with a view to plant them at Pelew.

When we reflect on the unhappy fate of poor Lee Boo, with which the reader is now acquainted, the mind ranges to the habitation of his father Abba Thulle, who on a cord had tied thirty knots, as a memento that his fon would return in thirty moons or perhaps a few more, for which he was willing willing to make allowance. Those moons have long since performed their evolutions; the knots are untied; and yet no gladdening fail hovers round Pelew. Lee Boo is dead in reality; and though no more even in the tortured imagination of his expecting family, yet the fight of an European veffel, even at this distant period, would animate their hopes, and recal the fondness of past endearments. It will be a long time before the Ariel will reach this friendly, this hospitable shore; when the joy of the King to see a return of the English, will be so far overclouded by his parental disappointment: but his mind is too noble, open, and generous, to entertain for a moment, a fuspicion that Captain Wilson could be guilty of inattention to Lee Boo, much less of baseness or ingratitude.

As a communication with the friendly isles of Pelew is about to be renewed, there is every reason to hope that we shall yet receive a sequel to some of the preceding circumstances, with further particulars of a race of unenlightened people, whose sincerity, and strict adherence to the dictates of honour and religion, are at once a disgrace and a burlesque on the passions and pursuits of those who consider themselves as much nearer the standard of perfection.
